Abstract

The article studies the struggle of Ubaidulla Asadullah Khojaev, a prominent representative of the Jadid movement at the beginning of the 20th century, the first Uzbek lawyer, publisher and publicist, for the freedom of the nation, based on the analysis of articles published in the newspaper "Sadoi Turkiston". In particular, attention is paid to the important role of the publicist's articles on topical issues of legal culture in the development of society.

Key words: Jadid, ignorance, art, upbringing, reform, , education, autonomy, national press, zarida.

Jadidism was a powerful social movement that gave impetus to the awakening of free thought in Turkestan. The supporters of the new reform, who began their activities by reforming education and opening new-method schools, soon acquired their own national press and literature. Newspapers such as "Tarakkiy", "Shukhrat", "Sadoi Turkiston", "Sadoi Ferghana", "Hurriyat", "Najot", and the magazine "Oyina" became the voice of the hearts of the freedom-loving young men. Among these progressive representatives, the first Uzbek lawyer, journalist and active participant in the national liberation movement, a victim of Bolshevik repression, Ubaidulla Asadulla Khodzhev (in sources given as Ubaidulla Khodzhayev) has a special place. His editorial and publicistic activities coincide with the years when, after graduating from school in 1913 and returning to his homeland, he first worked in the office of the civil service lawyer Ivan Charkovsky, and later independently practiced law. Ubaidulla, who was well-versed in the laws of the Russian Empire and a good speaker in Russian, soon gained great prestige as a fair defender in court proceedings. He was a member of the Tashkent reformist youth group organized by Munavvarkari Abdurashidkhanov and actively participated in the struggle against the tsarist colonialists. On December 21, 1913, he managed to obtain a permit number 37882 from the military governor of the Syrdarya region to publish a private newspaper in Tashkent under the name "Sadoi Turkiston" (Voice of Turkestan).[1]. The first issue of this newspaper was published on April 4, 1914. The prominent scholar of modernism, Boybuta Dustkaraev, said about it: "This newspaper was published in Tashkent in 1914 under the editorship of lawyer Ubaidullahoja Asadullahoja ugli. It is the longest-running newspaper published by Uzbek youth." [2]. In those years, the leader of the Jadid movement, Mahmudkhodja Bekhbudi, founded the newspaper "Samarkand" and the magazine "Oyina" in Samarkand, and in Fergana, enlighteners Ashurali Zohiri and Obidjon Mahmudov founded the newspaper "Sadoi Fergana". The role of the press as a socio-political tool in Turkestan was growing day by day. Hundreds of letters were received by the editorial office of "Sadoi

Turkestan". The main creative team of the newspaper was formed by the founders of Uzbek enlightener literature and journalism: Munavvarqori Abdurashidkhanov, Abdulla Avloni, Abdulhamid Sulaymon Chulpon, Tolgan Khojamyarov, who united in the desire for a common cause and idea and began to fight against national oppression. Ubaydulla Asadullaho'jaev and Munavvarqori Abdurashidkhanov write in the very first issue of the "Sadoi Turkistan" newspaper in the first issue of the newspaper "Sadoi Turkistan" in order to eliminate the "defects in the nation""[3]. In this place, the author calls on his compatriots to follow the example of other nations, develop the national press, unite and find a solution to the problems. we see that; "Instead of generosity, heresy and enmity prevail among us, instead of love and affection, quarrels and enmity prevail, instead of loyalty, greed and crime prevail, instead of eloquence and honor, instead of poverty and wealth, instead of guidance, misguidance prevails, instead of happiness, instead of benefit, discord prevails, instead of unity, discord prevails, instead of compassion and mercy, slander and backbiting prevail and the rule is decreed." Turkestan did not fall into this state without a reason. The disunity existing in the country, the discord and arrogance between the khanates, and the colonial rule of the Tsar were leading the people towards oppression day by day. New enlighteners like U. Asadullah Khojaev said, "...we Turkestans neither move according to the times, nor do we rely on our religious law, nor do we learn from our history..."[4] He calls on the people to fight against the heavy oppression and the shackles of slavery through education, science, and understanding of their rights. The publicist sharply criticizes the rich, who are busy with money, foolish, and extravagant weddings, accusing them of ignorance, and calls on the youth to help them enjoy modern science. At the end of the article, the author turns to his compatriots and says, "If our respected scholars, with their knowledge, our wealthy people with their wealth, and our youth with their efforts and enthusiasm, help and support, we will also make a weak statement and announce that we have died in the thought and dream of making our newspaper a daily newspaper in a short time," and hopes for national unity. Ubaidulla Asadullah Khojaev sharply criticizes the tyrannical policy of the tsarist government with more than ten publicist articles on socio-political topics. "We are left with only begging or stealing.""[5] In his article titled "Who is responsible for the misfortune of our children?", he rebelled against the Russian government's law declaring all the lands of Turkestan as royal property."[6] In his article, he advises fathers who, falling for the lies of some scholars, withdraw their children from modern science and Usul Jadid schools. "Life is not in wealth, but in mind and knowledge," the author writes. Nations that enjoy science and culture always win over others. But ignorant nations are always defeated." Ubaydullah Khoja made these words the slogan of the newspaper: "Science and skilled people make progress, ignorant and ignorant people remain underfoot." Almost a century has passed since these lines were written. In the meantime, our people have gone through many hardships. Finally, they gained their independence. New enlighteners like U. Asadullah Khojaev came to the conclusion that in order to save the nation from destruction and crisis, it is necessary to study modern science and education. In this way, he awakened the people who were in the sleep of heedlessness, and said, "Our industry is out of control.""[7] In his article, he expressed concern about the colonialists taking over the country's production system and called on the people to be vigilant. As is known, the inclusion of the Turkestan region into the Russian railway system in those years led to the transportation of our country's natural resources, in particular, raw materials and food products such as cotton, karakul, silk, and dried fruits, to the Center. At the same time, the local population was displaced from the fertile lands of Turkestan and thousands of Russian peasants were brought in and settled in their place. For example, if in 1887 196 families moved from Russia, in 1913 this number reached 2005. Ubaidulla Asadullah Khojaev, together with his fellow countrymen Munavvarqori Abdurashidkhanov, Abdulla Avloniy, Komilbek Norbekov, Tolagan Khojamyorov, Saidnosir Mirjalilov, and Mirmuhsin Shermukhammedov, founded the "Turon" society. On February 27, 1914, the official opening ceremony of the Uzbek National Theater took place in Tashkent in the Colosseum Theater building. This was congratulated on the pages of “Sadoi Turkestan”. It is clear that the nationalists tried to express the identity of the people not only through the press, but also from the theater stage. They described the national press as “the nation’s common classroom,” and the theater as “the school of thought.” “Sadoi Turkestan,” under the editor-in-chief of Ubaidulla Asadullahhojaev, openly fought against the land and tax policies of the tsarist government, as well as the electoral system. In particular, it wrote that out of 35 representatives to be invited to the State Duma in St. Petersburg, at least 10 should be representatives of the indigenous Turkestan population, “the law requires this.” On November 26, 1914, the editor-in-chief spoke at the 3rd meeting of the city duma, saying that the city tax on land and courtyards should not be increased, and that some Russian police officers were acting unlawfully in this regard, oppressing Muslims without any reason. On his initiative, a seven-member legal commission was formed under the duma, and the only representative from the local population, U. Asadullakhodjaev, was included in its composition. The newspaper "Sadoi Turkiston", which has a worthy place in the history of our national press, was closed on April 10, 1915, after the publication of its 66th issue, under pressure from the tsarist government, on the grounds of "financial difficulties". The revolution that took place in Russia in February 1917 put an end to the tsarist regime. Emperor Nicholas II abdicated. The national liberation movement in Turkestan, tired of half a century of colonial oppression, began to flourish. Among the sons of the nation - Jadids, Ubaidulla Asadullah Khojaev called on the entire people to unite and be united in order to gain the independence of Turkestan. He said this at the All-Russian Congress of Muslims held in Kazan in July 1917: “Until now, Turkestan has been a glutton for Russian capitalists. Today, Turkestan is a supplier of cotton to Russia. If 10-12 million pounds of cotton are grown in Turkestan annually, then 100 million soums earned by our cotton growers are annually going into the pockets of Russian capitalists.”[8]. When asked what is the power of the greedy Russian bourgeois capitalists who are taking over the entire Turkestan economy, the author answers with “our own fault.” How can we escape this humiliation? U. Asadullah Khojayev firmly says: “Only by studying and learning can we escape these torments.” In the end, “two professions remain for us. Theft and begging.” On July 20, 21, and 24, 1914, Ubaydullah Khoja published a small advertisement in a newspaper in Tashkent on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the Russian conquest of Turkestan and an article entitled “Preparation for the Anniversary.” It contains the following sentences: “They are fools, no matter how much joy they have. We are fools. Shall we just stare with our mouths open, saying that instead of joy we need sorrow?” The author answers this question as follows: “It is true that the Russian government has captured our city. It has taken away our government. However, it has caused the creation of railways, telegraph, and telephone networks in Turkestan... It is natural that the government will not refuse permission to do something useful, citing our 50 years of loyalty," he writes, adding that it is necessary to ask the government for permission to open a higher madrasah, a darul-muallimin, in Turkestan. "It is necessary for us to act quickly and open a regular higher madrasah that will train qazis, muftis, mudaris, teachers, imams, and muezzins. And it is easy and appropriate to open this on the occasion of this anniversary in every way"[9]. The hopes and dreams of the nationalist did not remain on the pages of the newspaper. On behalf of the Muslim deputies, Sayidnosir Mirjalilov announced a 16-article project on the establishment of a Muslim clerical body for consideration at the council meeting in St. Petersburg. This project raised the idea of protecting the people of Turkestan from economic, social, and legal aspects, that is, opening a higher madrasah that would train judges, muftis, and teachers and lecturers. The article raising these issues was published in the newspaper's July 1, 1914 issue, and on July 15, it was announced that this project had been approved by the city of St. Petersburg.[10]. Of course, this initiative of the editor-in-chief later led to the establishment of the People's Academy of Sciences (now the National University of Uzbekistan), founded by Munavvarkori Abdurashidkhanov. On November 26-28, 1917, the 4th Extraordinary Congress of Muslims of Turkestan was held in Kokand. The resolution of the congress adopted on November 27 stated: "The population of various nationalities living in Turkestan, expressing the will of the peoples called upon by the Russian revolution to self-determination, declares Turkestan to be territorially autonomous within the Federal Republic of Russia."[11]. On November 28, the name of the newly formed state was determined and declared "Turkestan Autonomy". Ubaidulla Khodzhaev (Ubaidullakhodja Asadullakhodzhaev) was elected Minister of War and a member of the Central Committee of the All-Russian Council of Muslims. However, on February 19, 1918, the Bolsheviks overthrew the Turkestan Autonomy by force of arms. The totalitarian regime began to persecute and expel the true children of the nation, the independence fighters, one by one. First, the mysterious death of Mahmudkhodja Behbudi, political accusations against Saidnosir Mirjalilov, Munavvarqori Abdurashidkhanov, Ubaidulla Asadullahkhodjaev and dozens of other brave sons of the Uzbek people, and the Bolshevik plague that swept through Turan destroyed the national heroes. As publicist Ibrohim Gafurov noted, Ubaidullahkhodja Asadullahkhodjaev was actually destroyed for defending the national interests of his people, "for fighting against colonialism." "[12]. Indeed, during his editorial career, Ubaidulla Asadullah Khojaev exposed the full extent of colonial oppression and extensively covered the issue of legal literacy on the pages of the newspaper "Sadoi Turkiston". For example, at that time, tram traffic was launched in Tashkent, and the drivers were Russians. At a meeting of the city duma, the editor-in-chief of the newspaper, as a member of the duma, mentioned the fact that several deaths had occurred on the road due to the oppression and disrespect of tram drivers towards Muslims, and raised the issue of their constant inspection. He even firmly demanded that Russian and Muslim carriage drivers be taxed the same. As is known, the first parliament, the State Duma, was established in Russia due to the revolutionary uprisings of 1905-1907. There was also injustice in the election of deputies from

Turkestan to the State Duma. According to the electoral law of December 11, 1905, all local women, two million workers, military personnel, students, and the general population under the age of 25 were deprived of the right to vote. Ubaydullah Khoja raised this issue on behalf of the editorial board in the article "City Elections and Muslims"[13] published an editorial entitled "Twenty-eight from Russians and twenty-two from Muslims are elected glasniy (deputies), despite the fact that Muslims have a few percentage points. From this point of view, even if it seems like we are being discriminated against, we are forced to put aside the law and regulations and complain only about ourselves."[14] . His articles such as "Sharia and Law", "In Various Places", "Who is to Blame for Our Children's Unhappiness?", "We Have City Taxes" were indications of what a free and independent Turkestan state should be like. The newspaper "Sadoi Turkiston", which lasted only a year but has a worthy place in the history of our national press, is closed due to U. Asadullakhodjaev's legal and political articles"[15] . This was not without reason. Because U. Asadullakhodjaev paid great attention to political and legal issues from the very first issues of the newspaper. In the article "Our Industry is Getting Out of Hand" by the publicist, he wrote about the sinister policy of the tsarist government: "Woe to us if we bite our fingers when we see others digging gold from our soil!!! Our carelessness was quickly taken advantage of by the open-minded people and continues to be taken advantage of."[16] , he regrets. "Russian muzhiks come from such distant lands and become so rich in less than ten years."[17] . This painful confession also reflects the remoteness of the local people from modern economic methods. Ubaydullah Khoja, while calling on his compatriots to be vigilant, emphasizes the need to find a solution to the problem. "If we continue in this state, our industry will be lost, and our workers will be unemployed," he says bitterly, but the truth is written. He concludes that the only solution is: "Let's send our children to various vocational schools and educate them in a modern way." U. Asadullakhodjaev gained great fame not only as the first Uzbek jurist, but also as a skilled publisher and talented publicist. His dream was to see the land of Turkestan among the free and developed countries. Therefore, he devoted his life and knowledge to the struggle for the independence of the nation. His progressive ideas, such as "the press should be the main reformer, the press is the mirror of the nation, and education is the life and death of the nation," have survived as an invaluable heritage that must be passed on to future generations.
