Annotatsiya. Ushbu maqolada atoqli adib Asad Dilmurodning "Rang va mehvar" romani misolida roman yozish mahorati tahlil qilinadi. Dilmurodning "yopiq shaklda gapirishga o'rganib qolgan tushunarsiz uslubi" adabiy klişelarga to'g'ri kelmaydigan romanning paydo bo'lishiga zamin yaratdi. Muallif bu asarda qahramonlarning ishini ko'rsatishdan ko'ra, ularning ichki kechinmalarini tasvirlashga ko'proq e'tibor qaratadi. Bundan tashqari, milliy nasrda sof g'arbiy uslubning namoyon bo'lishi kuzatiladi. Ayniqsa, mumtoz rivoyatlarda ko'rinib turganidek, buyum va hodisalarning inson taqdiri bilan bog'liq jihatlari, baxt va baxtsizlik o'rtasidagi abadiy ziddiyatlar portretga o'xshash aniqroq tasvirlarda aks ettirilgan.

Kalit so'zlar: adabiy jarayon, roman tuzilishi, qolip, syujet, psixologizm, psixologik tasvir, psixoanalitik timsollar, tarixiy roman poetikasi, psixologik tasvir elementlari, tush va timsollar, mavzu, kompozitsiya.

Аннотация. В данной статье анализируется мастерство написания романа на примере романа «Цвет и круг» известного писателя Асада Дильмурода. «Непонятный стиль Дильмурода, привыкшего говорить в замкнутой форме», создал основу для романа, бросающего вызов литературным штампам. В этом произведении автор больше внимания уделяет описанию внутренних переживаний героев, чем показу их действий. Кроме того, в национальной прозе наблюдается проявление чисто западного стиля. В частности, в классических повествованиях аспекты предметов и событий, связанные с человеческой судьбой, а также вечные противоречия между счастьем и несчастьем отражаются в более ярких, портретных образах.

Ключевые слова: литературный процесс, структура романа, стереотипы, сюжет, психологизм, психологическое изображение, психоаналитическая символика, поэтика исторического романа, элементы психологического изображения, сны и символы, сюжет, композиция.

Annotation. This article analyzes the novel-writing skills of the renowned writer Asad Dilmurod through the example of his novel "Rang va mehvar" (Color and Axis). Dilmurod's "incomprehensible style, accustomed to speaking in a closed form," laid the groundwork for the emergence of a novel that does not conform to literary clichés. In this work, the author focuses more on depicting the inner experiences of the characters rather than merely showing what they do. Additionally, manifestations of a purely Western style are observed in national prose. Especially, as seen in classical narratives, aspects of objects and events related to human fate and the eternal contradictions between happiness and misfortune are presented in clearer portrait-like images.

The artistic work is characterized by its regular updating of literary stereotypes we are accustomed to. By the way, while presenting trivialities encountered in everyday life as a work of art serves to somewhat dull the taste of those interested in literature, the creation of works that are difficult to digest "even after reading twice" testifies that the sun of hope has not yet set. This is because universal symbolic stereotypes come into being during a period that must be created, not every day. It is delightful that, a hundred years later, examples of symbolic and metaphorical interpretations have entered our literature in terms of form and content integrity, as a symbol of our entirely national-spiritual roots. Asad Dilmurod's novel "Rang va Mehvar" prepared the ground for the emergence of a novel with a style that "accustomed to speaking in a closed form" and does not recognize literary clichés. If the author himself became aware of what kind of work he had written during the course of reality.

In expressing the work through the language of symbols, we aim to provide clarity while keeping in mind that symbolic meaning is embodied. As noted by the renowned critic Q. Yuldoshev: "There is no plot in the novel, meaning that the events experienced by the characters are not described; rather, the traces of events that occurred at some point in the past are reflected in a retrospective manner in the psyche of the symbols. The characters do not exist in a world with distinct dimensions such as yesterday, today, and tomorrow; instead, all these dimensions are intertwined and reflected in a mixed-dimensional world that continuously shifts from reality to dreams. It is natural that this situation does not fit within the confines of a plot that must adhere to formal logic; therefore, the author focuses more on depicting what has transpired in the psyche of the characters rather than showing what they have done. ”[10.13-14]

It is noteworthy that the novel begins with the introduction of the setting in the prologue - "A small town lying at the foot of the Zarband Mountains, slumbering in the twilight of night." The "mixed-up" dreams and hopes of the sleeping small town's governor, Kamron Valis, passing in the midst of imagination and life, the innocent moments of longing for a scattered youth, do not give the hero any peace. The inner musicality of the work sounds in the language of full-fledged symbols. In order to find and feel it, a strong foundation of divine morality in the human heart is required. It can be said that Prof. Q.Yuldoshev correctly perceived and gave a worthy assessment of the image of the heroes who are the main reason for the emergence of this scattering.

At the beginning of the 20th century, Erich Fromm, who analyzed the issue of symbols, dreams, and the human psyche in psychology, like Freud and Jung, recommends dividing symbols, which serve as objects and subjects in a work of art, into three types:

1. Conditional;
2. Random;
3. Universal;

It is worth noting that the psychoanalyst defines the symbol as follows: “What is a symbol? Often a symbol is used as a “reference to other things.” Although this analogy is unsatisfactory, it can be used when it comes to designating our feelings, thoughts, and sensations related to our organs of sight, hearing, smell, and touch with “something.” This symbol is some kind of external expression of our inner world. Symbolic language is a language with the help of which we convey to the material world our inner feelings, experiences, what we are going to do, what is happening.”[2.47] Indeed, our inner feelings, experiences, emotions, and consciousness, such depressions that often occur in our minds between dreams and reality, are also a condition that has been proven to stimulate the soul of a writer-human to create. One of the aspects that is noticeable in the novel "Rang va mehvar" by writer Asad Dilmurod and makes it difficult to digest is the frequent switching from one image to another. For example, in the work, the continuous changes in the psyche of the main character Kamron give way to the image of him that echoes around him. We can also see this in the following image: "Why did he remember Apollo, who was once imagined as a young man holding a bow or musical instrument, he had tried to draw him in that position several times, but had not been able to do it satisfactorily, and he had kept a few sketches. His stock was not very large at all, it consisted of a number of paintings created from his student days to the present, which had not been sold or given to museums, each of which recalled some event in his life. Now, as if cast by the ghost of Apollo, on a long day with dark pink flowers, a tree with its branches stuck into the ground and its roots hanging in the air, a spell pulling a snake out of its mouth, a parrot with its beak tied with sticky paper, a boy trimming a bird's wing with his scissors shining, a wrestler lying on his back in a pile of thorns and his naked body wrapped in ivy - all of them green, yellow, and red, and the painting called Jilga, which stands at the farthest distance, is in the color of a rainbow...” [1. 13] The connection of the quoted passage to the plot of the novel is that it is clear that it is a tradition of the most distant reality reflected in the memoirs of the writer Kamron. The writer refers to Apollo, “who in ancient Greek mythology is the son of Zeus and Leto, a healer, a master of magic and a patron of the arts,” Asad Dilmurod, referring to the fact that in ancient Greek visual art he really appears as a young man holding a bow and arrow and a musical instrument, and describes the feeling of inner dissatisfaction in Kamron’s psyche in a very mysterious way for the reader. Here, the symbolic allusion emphasizes ancient Greek history, while saying that "a number of paintings created from his student days to the present, which have not been sold or donated to a museum, have been collected, each of which reminds us of an event in his life," and that this is precisely where the life of the next hero is given artistic touches. As a result, the main character Kamron "understands the truth taught by Vali Bakhshi more deeply after his thinking has become richer and his experience has increased" (1.14).

It is worth noting that “Freud explains the evil, slavery, mutism, mental illnesses, moral disorders, spiritual shamelessness, disbelief and weakness of faith characteristic of the 20th century as a result of a person’s indifference to his inner desires or the forcible suppression of these feelings... Freud, Jung and other representatives of the psychoanalytic school analyzed dreams and discovered that the symbols in them are similar in function to the symbols in myths, and they put forward the view that interpreting dreams facilitates the interpretation of myths” [5. 104-105] It seems that the creative experience gained in the integration of descriptive methods related to the plot of a universal symbol in a work of art in any situation has taken a special place in today's prose. In this regard, it is necessary to understand that Asad Dilmurod’s poetic skill in interpretation and description has found a unique method of depiction during the synthesis of Western literary traditions. This is made even more convincing by the eternal silence and spiritual exhaustion that permeates Kamran's psyche, the deceptive presence of the satanic quality in Sanam's appearance, and the relentless battle between Torah and Nasir's inner world against the outside world as a symbol of violence.

Prof. Y. Solijanov: "In my opinion, when designing the structure of the work, Asad Dilmurod followed the following ideas that he expressed 15 years ago: "The language of literature is a symbolic language, a figurative language. Speaking figuratively, artistic creation reveals the essence of the chosen subject, or rather, the drama of the soul, more deeply. When literature begins to speak in figurative language, it has wide opportunities to reveal the drama of the soul, the human soul more deeply. Usually, in works narrated in this way, the past and the present, the past and the future, fantasy and reality, time and space merge at one point - in the mind of the character and move at the same time. In the novel "Rang va mehvar" such a structural center is played by the image of Komron Vali. Through his soul drama, the reader becomes aware of the disorders and vices such as greed that occur in social life, especially in the field of fine arts. In my opinion, it is appropriate to perceive "Rang va mehvar" as another experiment of the talented writer Asad Dilmurod in his creative continuation of the traditions of the stream of consciousness inherent in world literature" [7.128-129]. Each gesture, symbol located in the architectonics of this source novel acquires a universal essence and is often reflected in the psyche of each hero. It opens the way to understanding the ever-changing spiritual journey. Along with the reader's pity and interest in the fate of Kamran Vali, a series of characters who do not turn away from any baseness in the wake of satanic desires and human lust combine the plot lines in a dialectical whole. In particular, the immoral acts such as adultery, debauchery, disbelief, deceit, envy, hypocrisy, and evil committed by the untouchable representatives of the Olajuz tribe open the way for the writer to further deepen the philosophical and aesthetic observation he is revealing. Therefore, the idea that the novel subtly hints at the fact that the great struggle and conflicts between the Zarband Ranges and the untouchable representatives of the Olajuz tribe will lead to the disintegration of social life also encourages the reader to think.

The symbol of the Olajuz people in the novel. Based on the spiritual pressures of the poor representatives of the Olajuz people, who are repeatedly mentioned as a symbolic symbol in the novel to make it understandable to the reader, Kamron Vali seems to have found some kind of divine message in the union. The reality revealed in the method of contrast creates sharp dramatic situations. Unlike Marcel Proust's magnificent novel "In Search of Lost Time", the capture of identity, the dialectic of the soul in it, the creation in the shadow of Kamron Vali, which takes place in the bubbles of imagination that are invisible at first glance, is developed in the manner of a hugely responsible work in the presence of the Creator. The Olajuz people also have a symbolic-figurative character in the novel, pouring water under each other, promoting evil, and feeling neither religious nor a desire to know their Creator, nor a need to understand their own identity. They are depicted in the paintings of artists in the storms of the era, scattered in different directions, in different colors. However, the writer occasionally introduces the specific plan of this people to the reader in an ironic mode. The reader should recognize it not as a mere plate, but as a wild, indeterminate creature that destroys all goodness in existence day by day. . Kamran Vali, the owner of the brush, who deeply understood the vile nature of this people, gave free rein to his emotions and began to discover something in his mind: "As the party heats up, Sanam becomes inspired, gradually merging with the body of the guests, then returning and gathering again in a silk dress, one of every three misguided people who cannot control his heart smiles pleasantly, meaning, 'My companion is my companion.'" Kamran Vali, who is drawn to a flawless face as if washed in milk, wants even more, after all, if he is like most people with this megajinn, he remembers that once his father compared Kurmagur to an idol, and not content with this, he later called it Shulluk, and in ancient times he grew up in a shell made of various minerals, and when the opportunity came, he easily cracked it, how many times did he have to draw this scene "I was looking forward to it, something always interfered, or rather, the anxiety of the series was overwhelming me..." [1.49] These events combine the artist's imagination and the development of his external imagination with the skill of the writer in a polyphonic image, so that a three-dimensional model of the world appears before your eyes. However, in explaining these issues, along with the philosophy of fate, he also gives ample space to socio-psychological analyses. However, true realist literature has never tied man and his fate to social conditions. It has always considered his strength to be higher than social conditions. His Holiness has perceived man as a possessor of great power capable of resisting the current, and has depicted him in a complex system of social relations [9. 39-40]

Therefore, it is appropriate to continue I.Yakubov's reasoning in the following form:

1) The chain of symbols in the work is updated and replenished during the transition from one place to another;
2) The writer testifies to the changes in the psyche of the hero Olajuz people from the perspective of hatred in Kamran's soul, testing the human will with a brush;
3) As a result of the exposure of the villains of the Olajuz people, the talented artist begins to recognize the mistakes he made;
4) The satanic desire in the form of an idol has always been present in every person's veins, and in some, it is further strengthened due to the fragility of faith;
5) The subjugation and dependence occurring in the beliefs of the existing system are transformed into a symbol manifested in the form of war;
6) The writer repeatedly reiterates that living with the dream of social progress is a virtue that is only inherent in wise people like Kamran Wali, who have the ability to maintain their composure in difficult circumstances.

Such an interpretation opens up a wide path to understanding the true purpose of the writer. As a result, the true creative intention of the writer is typified in the person of Kamron Vali, and a wide path is opened for the manifestation of a new image existence. “The main views of Kadinsky and, in general, supporters of abstract imagination are based on theosophical philosophy. In essence, they are close to the philosophy of Sufism and Buddhism in the East. The views of the Sufis, “Kill the ego within you, and then the inner self will reveal its essence,” correspond to the concept of “inner essence,” which was the main concept of the abstractionists of the 20th century” [6. 346-347]

The Olajuz people chosen by Asad Dilmurod also reflect the lifestyle of such materialized, weak strata. It is only worth living in the world of an artist. In Isajon Sultan's novel "Ozod", such as "The Story of the Invisible Man", "Shamol", "Tuz Cho'li", the main character Ozod, like Kamron Vali, fights relentlessly with the surrounding things and events in order to understand the wisdom of life and identity, are unique examples of the symbolic strokes that have been emerging in Uzbek prose in recent years. After all, in both novels, the concept of "people" works in a contrasting way, similar to the desires and inclinations of the main character. The lifestyle, happiness and luck of the people, and their desires are very similar to each other. In one, the reality taking place in a space is depicted with consciousness and emotion, while in the other, it is presented in the form of an "adventure". It is noteworthy that both were published in the magazine "Sharq yulduzi" with a difference of only 1 year. During this period, the stories and novels of such writers as "Boqiy darbadar" (I. Sultan), "Rang va mehvar" (A. Dilmurod), "Gorogli" (N. Eshonqul), "Bahovuddin's dog" (N. Eshonqul), "Haykallar oroli" (U. Hamdam), where symbolic and figurative imagery became a "custom", were published. The harmony of dream and symbol in the novel "Color and the Wheel" by the writer Asad Dilmurod is a universal phenomenon, which is considered an important category in the integration of the artistic development of creative intent. That is to say, in the plot parts, it is useful in convincingly revealing the imaginary world of the hero, in identifying the errors in the painful life crises of world and human relations. This is the first, and secondly, the writer leaves the final conclusion in the novel to the reader. The time line revealed during the analysis and description also creates conditions for performing a specific task based on enhancing imagery and deeply exploring characters. During the study, we can also see that the dream has become a universal category in the composition of the work. “Freud interpreted dreams as a mirror reflecting the invisible and inaudible side of the human psyche. Fromm said that there is no such thing as a dream that cannot be interpreted, and that even the most insignificant dream contains some symbol of a person’s mood and experience.”[3.102] Indeed, psychoanalysts who have analyzed and studied the process of human sleep have discovered valuable information about the variability of subconscious feelings, when and how they occur. Studying dreams as symbols is an important factor in determining the growth and changes in the creative world of a writer. For example, F. Kafka puts forward the idea that one of his novels was “a dream I had one night.” It is no secret that in Asad Dilmurod’s novel “Color and the Axis,” many realities are revealed through dreams and symbols. Erich Fromm writes about this: “Dream interpretation is a viaregia, a way to understand the unconscious thoughts in our minds, the reasons that strongly motivate our actions, both pathological and normal. Freud not only clarified the characteristics of dreams, but also, with perseverance and determination, restored the ancient idea of dreams. According to him, dreams are the fulfillment of our unreasoning wishes that have been suppressed in our minds.”[2.59]

Consequently, the theoretical considerations noted by Fromm in psychoanalysis pave the way for the perception of dreams as an aesthetic criterion that unites the parts of a work of art. The views of scientists such as Freud, Jung, and Fromm on dreams contributed to the rediscovery of the human world in the 20th century and the stabilization of concepts of consciousness and emotion. In this sense, in Asad Dilmurod's novel "Rang va mehvar" the emotional experiences of the characters are variable and occur as if they are moving from one world to another: "In fact, the matter is completely different. One night, at dawn, Nasir Akhun, who was sleeping soundly, having forgotten the bright world, dreamed of a giant hawthorn tree that had grown up bravely, breaking through the chest of giant hawthorn trees that were hugging each other. After he had wasted the fruit with a long stick, a strong wind suddenly arose, the branches shook loudly, and the tree fell into a deep pit like a stork. When he regained consciousness, he was lying on a soft bed with four broken legs, feverish, unable to bear the intense pain, he howled like a tiger, then, trying to calm himself, he put a wet rag on his hot forehead. Sanam, who was walking, touched his heart, and at such times, the cautious angel, who opened up even more and let out a lot of tears, skillfully sniffing out truth and lies, whispered in his ear that the hawthorns that had reached maturity in the Dolkoya Gorge were a disaster and that they were only good for causing such sorrow... Hearing the strange story from Vali Bakhshi, Komronboy began to feel uncontrollably crushed, he did not know which stone to hit his forehead against, the pain of the Dolkoya Gorge, which had lost its unique beauty, was increasing as he felt it, adding more and more pain to one pain after another, and he finally realized that he needed to find a way out of his humor, otherwise he would either burn out completely or live a lifetime hating himself. He should run to Mergan with his lungs in his arms, he shares everything in his heart only with him, his friend, who knows everything from the bottom to the top, will surely give him sound advice that will benefit him, but where did the kurmagur disappear to, did he enter the ground or fly to the sky, no matter how many times he goes there like a hunter's shuttle, he cannot find him in his yard, busy playing the drums of the big and small, he must have wandered somewhere in the sense that he wants to see my image in the hollow of my shoulder" [1. 36]

In the novel "Color and the Wheel", the writer follows the path of F. Kafka. It reveals the tragedy of the individual and the mood of the crowd driven by ego. That is, the social evils that talents like Kamron Vali encounter at different times are skillfully revealed.
