INTERPRETATION OF MORAL-SPIRITUAL CRITERIA IN THE EDUCATION AND UPBRINGING OF YOUTH IN FOZIL ZOHID'S LYRIC POETRY

Abstract.The article explores the moral-ethical upbringing of individuals through the medium of Uzbek literary art, focusing on the interpretation of moral-spiritual criteria in the personal, humanitarian, and professional development of youth, using the works of the poet Fozil Zohid as an example.

Keywords: criterion, upbringing, spirituality, literature, value, intellectual maturity

Studying the works of creative writers from the perspective of their era and individual interpretation plays a significant role in shaping the upbringing of youth, fostering their attitude toward cultural heritage, and enhancing their aesthetic taste by exploring the artistic interpretations of 20th-century realities through innovative approaches. Indeed, as noted, "…we have not yet fully explored our homeland, its unique history, culture, great scholars, and invaluable spiritual heritage." [1]

The creative output of Fozil Zohid, a master of literary art, including his prose, poetry, and publicistic works, has not yet been sufficiently studied or thoroughly researched as an object of academic inquiry. The author's works are diverse in themes, meticulously crafted in terms of educational and moral values, and capable of not only shaping the worldview of young readers but also captivating readers of all ages and professions, drawing them into a profound spiritual realm with an enchanted heart. In his poetic and prose works, Fozil Zohid primarily celebrates the essence of humanity. Through the magic of literary expression, he vividly portrays the social lifestyles of individuals in our society, their imaginative worlds, and the destinies of characters who have endured countless trials of life.

Through the medium of Uzbek literary art, the moral and ethical upbringing of individuals can simultaneously address two challenges of personal, humanitarian, and professional development among youth: overcoming the alienation from literary art that is prevalent among a significant portion of today's youth, and enriching the effective management of youth education with another method based on practical and relational criteria. Such management should be grounded in a clear system that establishes, elucidates, and practically tests pedagogical tools capable of activating mechanisms through which Uzbek literary art can influence the moral-ethical upbringing process. This system must primarily be based on the new meanings of the concepts of "spirituality" and "moral-ethical upbringing," distinct from the previous notion of "moral education." Furthermore, the term "moral-ethical upbringing" implies reliance on contemporary scientific ideas and spiritual values while considering national characteristics, with a focus on the comprehensive development of the individual. It can be said that the components mentioned above are fully expressed in the works of Uzbek literary art, as they are all embodied within the national literature.

The rich literary heritage of the Uzbek people, starting from epic literary monuments and culminating in the works of our contemporaries, not only encapsulates lofty moral-ethical principles but also reflects the national mentality—etiquette, dominant ethical values, lifestyle, and loyalty to family and communal relationships. Consequently, Uzbek literary art embodies moral-ethical ideas, situations, and values that resonate with readers, making it a powerful and multifaceted tool for exerting moral-ethical influence on youth.

The complexity of the task of defining criteria for the moral-ethical upbringing of youth, the ambiguity of scholarly opinions on this matter, and the new scientific theories regarding value indicators—studied as a combination of an individual's reflexive, communicative, creative, and axiological aspirations—have enabled higher education instructors to develop, apply, and recommend their own diagnostic systems. These systems outline criteria for awareness of moral-aesthetic and ethical factors in the moral-ethical upbringing process, in line with the psychological components of "Knowledge – Attitude – Activity," as well as value-oriented and value-transforming parameters and qualities of ethical-creative activity.

The moral-ethical development and upbringing of youth are processes linked to the normative foundations of their interactions with other social entities—family, community, supplementary education, cultural and sports institutions, mass media, and social networks.

Based on these upbringing criteria, it is essential to nurture patriotic youth, unlock their abilities and talents, and prepare them for life in a high-tech, competitive global world. At the same time, the younger generation must maintain constant interaction and collaboration with their families and other socialization entities, rooted in national traditions. The goal of this collaboration is to collectively create conditions for the moral-ethical development and education of youth. "Literature" serves as an effective tool capable of shaping all the moral and ethical values mentioned above. Simultaneously, as a tool for forming specific moral-ethical criteria, it is one of the most significant educational subjects capable of yielding important personal outcomes and results. In this context, studying the unique aspects of Fozil Zohid's creativity—one of the multifaceted creators of Uzbek literature—particularly the interpretation of moral-ethical issues in his lyrical poetry on a broader scale, and focusing on the criteria of upbringing within these works, constitutes the aim of this study.

Fozil Zohid's works captivate readers' attention due to their richness in drawing philosophical conclusions and generalizations from the events occurring in our daily lives. In his satirical works such as "Kattayev and His 'Tail'," "The Death of an Anonymous Person," "Has Anyone Seen Our Beloved?" "Norbuta's Dream," and "I Am Not Against Criticism," the poet humorously mocks certain individuals who hinder the progress of our society and its development.

In his work "Kattayev and His 'Tail'," the poet satirizes certain hypocritical and sycophantic individuals who, in the presence of their superiors, stop at nothing to please them, acting as their "tail"—serving as a crutch or support, even lulling their "master" to sleep with lullabies when needed. Fozil Zohid's humorous piece "Has Anyone Seen Our Beloved?" inadvertently recalls the words spoken by Ravshankhon in the epic "Ravshan and Zulkhumor" while searching for Zulkhumor. In this poem, the poet criticizes individuals who, claiming "this is my kin, that is my tribe," or "I must attend on a good day," spend their days wandering from one celebration to another without engaging in any productive work. Unfortunately, we still encounter such individuals today. Fozil Zohid's works cover nearly all social themes. Through his fables dedicated to eradicating certain societal flaws, the poet has contributed to expanding the scope of this genre. The themes of Fozil Zohid's fables are diverse, with their events drawn from everyday life. In several of his fables, such as "Free Prey,"

"The Boastful Poplar," "The Blue Crow and the Mouse," "The Donkey Goes to Hajj," "The Mouse and the Frog," and "Why Are Its Ears Long?" the depicted events and issues remain relevant today. The poet seeks ways to address these issues and combats negative phenomena by writing works that oppose such events.

Fozil Zohid did not limit himself to writing satirical works; he also created lyrical poems, remarkable rubais, and essays. In his book "The Land of Gujumlar," it is stated: "The poet Fozil Zohid is among those creators who entered the realm of poetry after honing his pen through years of journalism." Indeed, although Fozil Zohid boldly entered the literary scene in the 1950s, during this period he produced numerous essays, feuilletons, poems, and fables. In essays such as "The Teachings of the Master" and "Komiljon Otaniyozov," he crafted artistic portrayals of contemporary individuals.

Spirituality is intrinsically linked to enlightenment and culture. Spirituality does not emerge in individuals in a ready-made form. It is achieved only through continuous reading, learning, and gaining experience. A spiritually enriched person clearly understands the purpose of life, seeks a meaningful and fulfilling path, masters the culture of interaction, sincerely engages in actions beneficial to humanity, and approaches every issue from the perspective of justice and fairness. Such a person can distinguish between conscience and deceit, truth and falsehood, honor and shame, the permissible and the forbidden, avoids actions that lead to evil in life, and performs deeds that lead to goodness. In short, all these qualities are fully reflected in the works of Fozil Zohid, where the foundations of human spirituality are thoroughly illuminated.

"For a writer-creator, understanding the spiritual-emotional fabric of a person, finding a way to their heart, comprehending and expressing the subtle, mysterious, and magical feelings and experiences that can only be understood within the heart, and uncovering their essence and meaning is the most challenging yet profoundly important task, perhaps the primary one." [2]

Indeed, this is one of the most difficult tasks for a creator. As we read Fozil Zohid's works, each of his poems teaches the reader to reflect, practice patience and gratitude, understand their own identity, and cultivate their inner self.

For instance, in the poem "Haste Is Permissible," detailed insights are provided about the quality of hastiness, which is inherent in every individual, highlighting both its positive and negative aspects. The poem outlines the traits one must adopt to achieve happiness in human endeavors and emphasizes the need to abandon actions that lead to evil.

Hastiness is a trait of the devil, if you know,
Many regret this trait, if you know.
Few have reached the finish line with haste,
If you are a river, flow in your own course.
Be it worldly affairs or worship,
Hastiness is a habit of the impatient.

The negative aspects of hastiness are described as: a devilish trait; always leading to regret; a sign of impatience; and a habit harmful to both this world and the hereafter. The poet offers valuable advice with the line, "If you are a river, flow in your own course." However, for wise individuals, the poet notes five instances where hastiness is deemed necessary:

But in five instances, hastiness is justified,
It is essential to know this, O wise one.
When a guest arrives, immediately welcome them,
Do not delay the meal, set the table.

First and foremost, the poem addresses the etiquette of hospitality and guest reception, rooted in the highest human and sincere virtues, outlining the moral-ethical requirements, specific rules, and traditions to be followed in mutual interactions and relationships. Knowing and adhering to the etiquette of hospitality is considered a hallmark of spirituality. In our people's tradition of hospitality, whenever a guest arrives at a home, a table is immediately set, and bread is offered.

The poem emphasizes that hastiness in this regard is obligatory. Additionally, it is stated that the sooner a person who has sinned hastens to repent, the more likely their sins will be forgiven. The poet also presents, in wise verses, the permissibility of hastening to bury a deceased person, leaving the reader inspired to take lessons that are solely beneficial. In our view, the roots of human spirituality are strengthened through such teachings.

In the poet's quatrain titled "Gratitude," the countless blessings bestowed upon humanity by Almighty Allah are emphasized: "If you try to count the blessings of Allah, you will not be able to enumerate them." [3]

Whatever He gives, be grateful and content,
Blessings will enter, and you will see abundance.
Stop saying "No, no," teach your tongue to say "Yes, yes,"
May Allah turn the lacks of the grateful into abundance.

Humans desire the blessings bestowed by Almighty Allah to be continuous and abundant. To achieve this, gratitude is necessary. The Holy Quran promises that blessings will be continuous and abundant due to gratitude: "And remember when your Lord proclaimed: 'If you are grateful for My blessings, I will surely increase them. But if you are ungrateful, indeed, My punishment is severe." [4]

Among Fozil Zohid's works, one can find numerous poems in a moral-ethical spirit, such as "The World Returns," "Do Not Be Greedy," "Etch Love in Your Heart," "Innocent Tongue," "Be Vigilant," "O Life," and "Do Not Fear the Devil."

The central theme in Fozil Zohid's poems from "The Flower of Patience" is the concept of the ideal human, and works in this direction hold a special place in the development of artistic thought in 20th-century Uzbek poetry. The theme of the ideal human is also depicted in poems such as "The Bond of the Guide," "Contentment," "The Bond of Presence," "Wonder," and "Not One of Us." This journey of life lies in the idea of a person realizing their true self through the path to Allah. In the poem "True Words," the poet also portrays the qualities of an ideal human, focusing on virtuous deeds and faith. There is a religious belief among the people that speaking ill of the deceased is a sin. The poet's heart aches at the fact that some do not understand the evil of malicious people or the folly of fools, even in the eternal world, without truly knowing them. Literary scholar N. Rahimjonov described the characteristic features of the literature of the independence era as follows: "Several leading trends that define the significant virtues and unique characteristics of independence-era literature are evident. Namely, qualitative changes in the culture of artistic thought are becoming apparent in the nation's self-awareness, appreciation, and glorification of its identity, as well as in the formation of feelings of national pride. Another leading principle is that whether our writers address historical realities, religious ideas, or the present day, their works are distinguished by a socio-philosophical concept aimed at ensuring national unity." [5]

When analyzing Fozil Zohid's poem "Among People," we first encounter lines that reflect humanity:

O human, know your place,
Among people.
Practice humanity,
Among people.

The poem begins with an address to humanity, emphasizing that every person must know their place and, having been created as a human, should promote humanity among their fellow beings. Indeed, regardless of who a person is, they must remain human. For while a position may be temporary, a person's character and conduct are matters for a lifetime.

From the beginning to the end of the poem, we can understand the advice and duties necessary for humanity. Other lines highlight the need to find a good friend on the path to guidance, the virtue of doing good deeds, seeking blessings from the elders of the community, practicing humility, thinking before every step, overcoming anger, avoiding arrogance, and embracing the qualities that lead a person to all forms of goodness.

Walk the straight path, do not stray,
Do not bow to wealth.
Do not say "I, I," do not boast,
Among people.

These lines serve as clear evidence of our argument. "Instead of looking for faults in others, look at yourself," the poet says in another stanza of the poem. For a person who focuses on their own flaws has no time to concern themselves with others. Each person is accountable for themselves, and you have no business with the actions or conduct of others—this is the meaning we can derive. In this transient world, there are all kinds of people, but you must choose the right path, make humility your companion, and even if your heart aches, do not cause pain to others, the poet emphasizes.

The central idea of Fozil Zohid's work is also the concept of the ideal human. In our country, great attention has long been paid to the issue of nurturing the ideal human. As a result, history has seen the emergence of many great, well-rounded individuals who, with their spiritual virtues and physical capabilities, have astonished the world. The rich scientific, socio-philosophical, and spiritual legacy they left behind has become the invaluable treasure of our people. Alisher Navoi, in one of his quatrains, called for "Strive for perfection," intending the acquisition of the many qualities necessary for an ideal human. "Literature must delve into human emotions, pain, and the path of life. Why does a person live in such a way? What is the meaning of human life, what qualities do they possess as a human, and what are their unique aspects—these must be fully reflected in a work." In conclusion, through his call to goodness, the poet Fozil Zohid aims for individuals to rise to perfection—spiritually, morally, intellectually, and physically. It would be accurate to say that he has accomplished this task with exceptional creative mastery. [6]

Literary scholar and critic Bahodir Karim once said: “A poet must always be concerned with the longevity of their poems. Literary scholars cannot extend their lifespan. Literary scholars do not possess such a remedy in their pockets.” [7] Indeed, if a true poet casts their pure emotions into the whirlwind of fleeting worldly interests, those poems are doomed to be forgotten. For times change, and generations evolve. Only if a true poet is a creator of delicate, eloquent, and virtuous words can their poems, like precious gems, forever find a place in the hearts of the people across centuries. In our view, Fozil Zohid’s poetry, nourished by the source of eternal values, will continue to successfully pass the test of time as a collection of priceless works.
