THE CONCEPT OF "BEAUTY" AND ITS LINGUISTOCULTURAL INTERPRETATION

Annotation: Beauty is an aesthetic concept that creates feelings of joy, affection, pleasure and freedom in a person. There are a lot of theories, views, teachings about beauty. In them, various aspects of the concept of beauty are noted. The article discusses theoretical considerations about the concept of "beauty", the relationship of the eastern and Western worlds to beauty. Also, the linvomadanian interpretation of aesthetic concepts is analyzed. The role of beauty in the system of cultural values is reflected on the criteria that verbalize the concept.

Keywords: beauty, national culture, aesthetic assessment, linguistics, National thinking.

Everyone perceives beauty in their own way. There is no single, definitive definition of beauty. Scholars have long tried to express their general views on this. According to Socrates, things that are useful and necessary for a person are beautiful. According to Plato, a person can perceive beauty only in a certain aesthetic-spiritual mood. According to his teachings, beauty is not inherent in things and objects, but is an idea, a concept that arises as a result of a person's spiritual-aesthetic attitude to reality. According to Aristotle and Diderot, harmony and proportion in things and phenomena constitute beauty. Any beauty is based on a standard related to human thinking. Kant believed that the basis of beauty is the free enjoyment of things and phenomena by man, while Hegel believed that the beauty of art is more perfect than the beauty of nature, because in it the image and the idea find their absolute harmony. Chernyshevsky supported the idea that life is beauty, that everything that corresponds to human life, needs and goals is beautiful.

Although Central Asian thinkers perceive beauty within the framework of Islamic beliefs, they tried to emphasize that it is a complex spiritual process. The Quran also pays special attention to the issue of beauty. In addition to external (appearing) beauty, the importance of internal (inner) beauty is also emphasized. We have created man in the most beautiful form and shape (Surah At-Tin (The Fig), verse 4). Allah promises His believing servants beautiful places in Paradise and beautiful women. It is also emphasized in the Holy Quran that "beautiful things" are shown to Allah's servants "in a beautiful way." External and internal beauty also play an important role in the Islamic world. The views of Eastern thinkers on beauty are directly based on humanistic thinking. Such an attitude, in turn, also affects the philosophy of Sufism. "...this teaching explains that the universe is the creation of the Creator, the mirror of God. Accordingly, the source of all beauty is the Absolute God, and the beauties of reality are a reflection of the beauty of God. In Sufism, the beauty of the real material world is not denied (although there is a negative attitude towards the world and its wealth), but rather the real material world is considered to be of no value in itself [1]. Concepts such as "beauty", "glory", "purity", "purity", "decoration" are equated with beauty in the teachings of Sufism. The cornerstone, basis, and foundation of Sufism ethics are the beauty of the soul and high intelligence. According to the teachings of Farabi, beauty is an expression of the physical, spiritual, and moral beauty of a person. Alisher Navoi believed that all beauty is in life and man, and at the same time, all ugliness and impurity are also in man, therefore he attached great importance to human education. According to the idea put forward by representatives of various philosophical trends in world aesthetics of the 19th-20th centuries, beauty is a concept related to the human psyche, soul, and spirituality. The source of beauty is in the soul of a person.

There are certain differences between the concepts of "beauty" and "beauty". Beauty is a concept that expresses the appearance, condition of things, and the harmony of the work performed or the action performed. Beauty leaves a pleasant impression on people, but at the same time, the same beautiful thing or event can also cause unpleasant situations. Beauty has both objective and subjective characteristics. While the word "beautiful" as an aesthetic assessment expresses a particular thing or person, often the proportionality and harmony of external signs and forms, the word "beauty" refers to a concept, imagination, and ideal in the human mind. According to the scientist B. Khusanov, who analyzed the essence of beauty and approaches to it in a philosophical and aesthetic context, "beauty is a phenomenon of reality (nature, society, art) that, by influencing something through emotions, allows for an increase in the flow of physical and spiritual forces in a person, creating a state of joy, pleasure, and spiritual satisfaction... Beauty is more important than concepts such as "beautiful", "handsome", "elegant", "attractive", "charming" [5, 12]. H. Gafurova, speaking about the Japanese interpretation of beauty, writes, "It is not difficult to create external beauty, but external beauty in a person is worthy of admiration only when it is combined with internal beauty, which includes aesthetic standards determined by education, etiquette, and behavioral boundaries," [4, 188]. Emotional assessment categories are formed on the basis of a person's attitude to reality, therefore emotional assessment has a subjective character. After all, this assessment is associated with the perception of reality by an individual person and the criteria of values that apply to it. The common human-spiritual aspects of these concepts form a universal idea of beauty. There is no definitive opinion about a complete scientific definition of beauty. However, the thoughts expressed, ideas put forward, views and teachings created about the perception, manifestation and reflection of beauty in art, and its impact on the development of society are of great importance.

Over the centuries, each nation has developed its own national-aesthetic taste, worldview, attitude to beauty, imagination and requirements. The criterion for perceiving beauty and aesthetic assessment is a national-ethnic characteristic, and the parameters considered beautiful for one nation may be completely meaningless for another. For example, the long and dark hair of Japanese women, flowing over their shoulders, was considered a symbol of beauty. "The Japanese consider flowing hair as a symbol of the unity of spiritual and external beauty. In Egypt, straight hair is considered a sign of beauty. Although most Egyptian women are naturally curly, "many girls are forced to straighten their curly hair from a young age, in accordance with the beauty standards of society" [7].

For a long time in China, small "lotus" feet were considered a symbol of female beauty. For Europeans, such feet meant nothing more than horror. The process of bringing the feet into this position began at about the age of five. Mothers tightly wrapped narrow cloths around the feet of their children. For the next five years, the girls wore these cloths day and night without removing them. As the child grew, the shape of the feet gradually changed. At the same time, the girls had to endure terrible physical pain. This "custom" lasted for ten centuries and disappeared only in the 20th century [7].

For the Spaniards, the standard of beauty is the monkey. The gait of Indian women is compared to the stride of an elephant, and this is considered a sign of beauty. "In China and Korea, a woman's face is likened to an apricot or a willow branch, and a beautiful face shape (oval shape) is emphasized using a pumpkin seed as a standard" [2, 16]. "It is known that blue eyes in Russians, green eyes in English, and black eyes in Uzbeks are considered to be the main elements of national beauty and completeness" [2, 16].

In Uzbek national thinking, the female figure that represents "beauty" is represented as an image with dark and sparkling eyes, long eyelashes, black and arched eyebrows, a small mouth and bud-shaped lips, white and even teeth, a sharp nose, black, long and fragrant hair, a white face and red cheeks, a compact, graceful figure, a thin waist; graceful in expression and movements, a pleasant and soft voice, a gentle nature, obedient, and sometimes cheerful. For example:

Labing g'uncha, yuzing ikki qizil gul,
Qading sarvu soching go'yoki sunbul (Furqat).
Tishing dur, labing marjon, xading gul, xating rayhon,
Yuzung xur, soching anbar, so'zung mul, menging meynon.
Meynon menging, so'zing mul, anbar soching, yuzung xur,
Rayhon xating, xading gul, marjon labing, tishing dur (Bobur).

The Holy Quran also pays special attention to the issue of beauty. It emphasizes the superiority of inner beauty over outer beauty.

While the Uzbek word "beautiful" refers to the proportion and harmony of external signs and forms as an aesthetic assessment, the word "beauty" expresses a concept, imagination, and ideal in the human mind.

In conclusion, the concept of beauty has a national-ethnic and national-cultural nature, and emerged in the process of a certain people's perception of things and phenomena in nature on the basis of the features that arouse pleasure and joy in them. Specific criteria and patterns of beauty were formed. They were reflected in the artistic works of their time. For example, in Uzbek classical artistic texts, beauty was interpreted in the form of a Woman. For her lips, rubies and rubies; for her face, silver, apples, flowers; for her teeth, pearls and coral; for her eyes, narcissus, deer, gazelle; for her eyebrows, bows, altars, crescents, swords; for her hair, snakes, armies; for her figure, cypresses, and shamshods, a group of prototypes and standards was formed and became a traditional method of depiction.
