ARTISTIC INTERPRETATION OF MIGRATION AND FOREIGN EXPERIENCE IN CONTEMPORARY UZBEK NOVELS

Adilova Soliyakhon

PhD, Associate Professor of the Department of Uzbek Language and Literature of Samarkand Institute of Economics and Service. Uzbekistan

Annotation: This article analyzes the literary interpretation of migration and foreign experience in modern Uzbek novels. It explores themes such as external migration, crisis of cultural identity, alienation, and spiritual search through character representation. The works of Isajon Sultan, Ulugbek Hamdam, and Muhammad Ali are used to reveal the personal and social issues connected with going abroad.

Keywords: Modern Uzbek literature, migration, cultural identity, alienation, foreign experience, literary analysis.

After gaining independence, active artistic reflection on migration processes began in Uzbek literature. Especially in the 21st century, themes of departure abroad, adaptation to new cultural environments, and the crisis of identity have become increasingly prominent in novels. This is connected not only with the intensification of migration flows but also with profound changes in public consciousness. Writers strive to artistically depict the inner conflicts between national "self" and foreign surroundings.

Isajon Sulton - "Among People"

Isajon Sulton's novel "Among People" is a profound study of human psychology, revealing the inner experiences of an individual who finds themselves in a state of spiritual and social isolation. The author describes with subtle psychological precision the protagonist's feeling of loneliness, being among people but not feeling a connection with the surrounding society. This is not only physical emigration but also a metaphor for internal escape — mental emigration, where a person retreats into their own world, detached from social and cultural realities. The characters reflect on leaving their homeland not just for material well-being but also in search of inner peace and harmony. Through images filled with introspection and inner struggle, the author raises the issue of the loss of identity and the sense of belonging. The novel becomes not just a narrative about migration but a philosophical reflection on spiritual exile, where the homeland loses its emotional significance.

Ulugbek Hamdam - (White House)

Ulugbek Hamdam's novel (White House) is a multilayered narrative filled with symbolism and philosophical reflections on the fate of a person caught in a cultural and spiritual whirlwind beyond their homeland. The main character, an immigrant, faces not only language and cultural barriers but also deep personal disorientation. The symbol of the "White House" in the novel represents an unattainable dream, an illusory notion of an easy life abroad. The artistic style of the novel is rich in poetic expressions, allusions, and intertextual elements, allowing the author to explore the theme of hybrid identity, cultural rupture, and memory. Through a subtle psychological portrayal of the protagonist's internal state, the reader observes the process of losing a sense of belonging, emptiness, moral exhaustion, and longing for spiritual support. This novel is about a person's struggle to preserve themselves in a foreign world.

Muhammad Ali - (Pain)

Muhammad Ali's novel (Pain) is a socio-psychological work that vividly reflects the realities of labor migration. From the very first pages, the reader is immersed in an atmosphere of oppression, uncertainty, and the constant struggle for survival. The main character goes to Russia to earn a living and faces helplessness against the system, exploitation, alienation, and the gradual loss of human dignity. The inner experiences of the protagonist play a key role in the novel — homesickness, silent hope, and the constant search for meaning. The author skillfully describes everyday details, showing migration not as a heroic act but as an everyday drama full of suffering and loss. The narrative style is realistic, rich in details, which enhances the effect of empathy and makes the work a vivid reflection of the social problems of modern society.

Thus, all three works reveal the complex and multifaceted theme of migration in their own way, showing both external and internal conflicts of the individual. They become not just a reflection of a social phenomenon but also a way of artistically exploring the crisis of identity and the search for spiritual support in a foreign environment.

Contemporary Uzbek literature is increasingly turning to the theme of migration and foreign experience, reflecting the deep internal transformations of society in the context of globalization. In the works of Isajon Sulton, Ulugbek Hamdam, and Muhammad Ali, migration is considered not only as physical movement in space but also as a spiritual, psychological, and cultural trial for the individual. These novels raise important issues of self-identification, cultural alienation, moral choice, and loss of roots. The characters find themselves in situations where familiar landmarks disappear, and new ones are not fully embraced as their own. In this context, emigration becomes not just a social necessity but an existential crisis, where personal, family, and national experiences intertwine. The artistic interpretation of migration in these works allows the reader not only to empathize with the protagonists but also to reflect on their own identity boundaries, place in the world, and spiritual foundation. Literary analysis shows that migration is not just the physical crossing of borders but also a transition between states of the soul: from hope to disappointment, from alienation to self-reflection. Thus, the theme of migration in contemporary Uzbek prose acquires philosophical depth and becomes an important element in shaping a new public consciousness. Through the language of art and artistic imagery, the authors provide an opportunity to understand the complexity of human fate in an era of change and seek answers to eternal questions: Who are we, where do we come from, and where are we going.
