In creating the image of Ibn Sina, the reality of life and artistic fabric

Abstract

The creation of historical reality and the character of a historical person in fiction is a complex process, in which creators create styles specific to each event and event and refer to genres when creating a work of art. This can only be confirmed by the colorful aspects used in the creation of the image of Ibn Sina, the great scholar of the East.

Keywords: Anochronism, Epic, Hakim, Ibn Sina, Character, Typification, Generalization, Legend, Narrative, Afshona, Ray, Juzhoniy, Momin Qanaat, Abdulla Oripov. Medical science. The cure of death.

It is known from history that Abu Ali Ibn Sina, the sultan of medical science on earth, was a great judge, philosopher, linguist, literary critic and astronomer, and he became a well-known and popular person during his lifetime. Because of this, during his lifetime, various memories, legends and legends were created about him among the people. Therefore, the works created about him are completely different from each other and require separate study.

Observations show that in all literary and literary-journalistic works about Ibn Sina, two main aspects are evident:

First, most of the works about Ibn Sina consist of memories, recollections, and impressions of the scholar. This tradition, begun by Abu Ubayd Juzzhani, has been preserved and improved in all written works created in the 20th century. A. Irisov's "Abu Ibn Sina", S. Ulugzoda's "Piri Hakimov Mashriqzamin" ("The Elder of the Eastern Sages"), historical and publicistic treatises, O. Yakubov's novel "The Old World", Abdulla Aripov's epic poem "Hakim and Death", S. Ulugzoda's drama "Ibn Sina's Youth" and a number of other works are mainly works of this category.

The second group is oral folk literature, such as legends and tales about Ibn Sina. Dozens of legends and tales, such as "Ibn Sina and the Woman" and "Ibn Sina and the Cure for Death," reflect the unique characteristics of Ibn Sina.

Both the Tajik poet Momin Qanoat and the Uzbek poet Abdulla Aripov skillfully use these two traits that shape the image and character of Ibn Sina in their epics. While M. Qanoat created his epic on this topic "The Cradle of Sina" directly based on the hero's own memories and experiences, A. Aripov, in his epic "The Wise Man and Death," relies on folk tales and legends of the second direction in creating the character of the scholar.

M. Qanoat's epic poem "The Cradle of Sina" at first glance resembles a historical-biographical work about the life and work of the great scholar. The work adheres to a strict chronological order of dates and events related to the life and work of Ibn Sina.

The plot of the work begins with the birth of a young child in the Sitarabonu family in the village of Afshana, located directly near Bukhara. One day, the emir of Bukhara, Nuh ibn Mansur, falls ill. Young Hussein treats him. In return, he is lucky enough to enter the emir's library and work. When the Karakhanids capture Bukhara, Nuh Samani is overthrown from the throne. Hussein, along with his brother Mahmud, leaves Bukhara and goes to Khorezm. In Khorezm, he takes a place in the circle of scholars at the court of Al-Mamun. He works with Abu Nasir Iraqi, Abu Said Masihi, Abu Rayhan Beruni, etc. He conducts scientific debates with them. The ruler of Ghazna, Mahmud Ghaznavi, sends a request to Al-Mamun to send scholars such as Ibn Sina to his service. Feeling powerless to resist, the ruler of Khorezm told Ibn Sina and other scholars that they should go to Ghazni. The scholars refused. Ibn Sina also secretly left Khorezm and came to Nishapur. In Nishapur, he met and debated with Sheikh Abusaid Maykhani, one of the representatives of Sufism. After that, he came to Juzjan. He met Juzjani and became friends for life.

He went to Raig, one of the most famous states of his time. There, Ibn Sina was with King Saida and, at her request, treated the king's mentally retarded son, Majid al-Dawla. Majid al-Dawla, who recovered, took his mother's throne. One day, during his reign, a rebellion broke out. He sent a petition to Mahmud Ghaznavi to suppress the rebellion. Ghaznavi not only pacified the rebellion, but also captured Majid al-Dawla himself. Ibn Sina, who did not like Mahmud Ghaznavi, left this place and came to Hamadan - to serve King Shamsud al-Dawla. He had a disease of the gypsy. He treated his disease and was thus appointed to the post of minister. He worked tirelessly for the welfare of the country. When Shamsud al-Dawla died and the throne passed to his son Samud al-Dawla, Ibn Sina refused to serve him. Then the ruler of Isfahan captured Hamadan. Ibn Sina also comes to Isfahan.

In Isfahan, Ibn Sina was very active in his work. He wrote a number of works. Masud, the son of Mahmud Ghaznavi, attacked Isfahan and destroyed Ibn Sina's library. He took many of his works to Ghazna. The plot of the work ends with the lyrical hero's thoughts about Ibn Sina's death in Hamadan.

At first glance, the plot development of the work seems to be no different from a dry interpretation of historical reality. However, in the epic, the poet does not seek to give a simple interpretation of these events, but rather tries to find the qualities inherent in the character of the scholar from the depths of that historical reality. For example, the epic emphasizes that Noah Samani falls seriously ill. All doctors try to cure him. But they cannot find a cure. Then they call Ibn Sina. Ibn Sina finds a cure for the emir's illness. The emir asks Ibn Sina what he can get in return. Ibn Sina responds:

... "Oh my lord, I would be so happy,
If I pass the test of a king like a dervish.
This is the supreme gift.
I have no other passion.
I am a market for world goods and knowledge
Allow me, the treasure of knowledge - that's why I'm a seeker."

Thus, Ibn Sina receives permission to enter the emir's library and read. This creates in the reader's mind the image of a person who highly values knowledge and sees it above all else.

In another episode, it can be seen that the poet made large generalizations based on historical events. To prove our point, it is worth considering the following two interpretations:

A. Kayumov, in his historical and publicistic work “Abu Raykhan Beruni, Abu Ali ibn Sino,” describes the emir's illness, where and in what condition he was lying, and how Ibn Sino visited him as follows: “When Hussein entered the house where the emir was lying with the doctors, he was suffocated by the stuffy air of this house, decorated with royal decorations, with expensive carpets and luxurious blankets.

The Amir lay motionless, breathing heavily on layers of satin blankets on the floor of the house. Beside him, a little girl was breathing heavily. The house was filled with fever.” Thus, the doctor began to treat the Amir. He gave him various medicines and cured him of his severe illness.

And M. Kanoat creates a general picture of this situation:

They brought Sinon,
Young and clever - wise,
He saw the noise of the crown on the patient's head,
He said: "O my lord, forgive me and raise the crown,
Who is the judge, one patient alone is enough."...
... Amir fell from the head of a more desperate grudge,
For his sweet soul,
He passed away from the golden crown.
He made a gesture and left the room empty.
The king is free from arrogance.
And the patient felt
And felt helpless...
... He said to the king: "If my command is fluent, it is a cure for pain,
What I ordered is obligatory and binding like an order."

If the above interpretation of historical reality presents a simple picture to the reader, then deep meaning is hidden in the poetic interpretation. In it, the poet gives a philosophical generalization that the king and the beggar are equal in the face of the doctor and the disease. The emir, who always tried to give orders, is now forced to carry out the doctor's order. The poet puts the doctor above the king.

The epic is characterized not only by the interpretation of historical events, but also by the interpretation of the attitude of the lyrical hero to this historical reality and to Ibn Sina, the protagonist of the work. In this, the poet avoids simple narration and makes sharp philosophical observations. For example:

You said forever Ernie - it's inevitable
You called the mind a light, the world is brighter than it.
You opened the world of secrets and said that you are a writer
You solved the secret of death...
It's a spell, dear.

The poet's effective use of memories and recollections of Ibn Sina in the work also had a significant impact on the overall structure of the work. The structure of the epic differs from most epics. At first glance, it seems that the poet uses two hero perspectives to achieve his goal. The first is the lyrical hero, and the second is the main character - the narrator.

In the epic, the narrator, that is, the main character of the work, Ibn Sina, continues to tell stories about his own experiences. Most of the development of events consists of a collection of his own memories and recollections. However, this does not mean that the lyrical hero in the epic is removed from the interpretation of the development of events. In the work, the lyrical hero often gives way to the main character - the narrator, but also appears as a hero who develops events, connects the narrator's various stories and expresses his own attitude to them. It can be said that M. Qanoat skillfully used all the possibilities of the epic genre in creating the character of Ibn Sina and was able to demonstrate his unique artistic skill. In particular, he demonstrated how rich all the possibilities of the epic genre are.

In the epic "Sino's Cradle" one encounters a number of episodic characters of historical figures. They can also be conditionally divided into two types:

The first group: emirs and heads of state such as Nuh Somoni, Ali Ma'mun, Mahmoud Ghaznavi, Sayida Malika, Majidudduvla, Shamsuddavla, Samouddavla, Alouddavla, Masul Ghaznavi.

The second group: scholars, thinkers and religious figures such as Beruni, Abu Nasr Iraqi, Abusahl Mashihi, Abu Ubaid Juzhani, Sheikh Maikhani.

The poet also uses episodic images of these historical figures to directly create the character of the main character. This can be fully confirmed only by familiarizing himself with the role of the image of Beruni in the work. These two scholars, who first met and became acquainted in Khorezm, were always in creative contact. They debated and discussed in the field of science. Therefore, it has become a tradition to always interpret the images of these two thinkers together not only in historical sources, but also in works of art. For example, in Odil Yakubov's novel "The Old World", the heroes of the work, Beruni and Ibn Sina, serve to complement each other's unique characteristics, one through the other. This tradition is also followed in the epic poem "The Cradle of Sina", and although it is an episodic character, the image of Beruni is also used.

In the epic, the image of Beruniy served to reveal the keen observation and strong knowledge characteristic of Ibn Sina. In this, the poet used the scientific debate between Ibn Sina and Beruniy. Beruniy raises various scientific problems. Ibn Sina, on the other hand, finds a solution to each problem with technique. In this way, the poet skillfully reveals that Ibn Sina was a powerful scholar.

The image of Sheikh Abdusaid Maikhani was introduced into the epic to show Ibn Sina's attitude to religion. For this, the poet used the famous dialogue between Hakim and the Sheikh. According to sources, after this meeting, the famous Sufi sheikh and the great medical scientist "recognized each other. Ibn Sina said to his students: "What I understand, Abusaid calls feeling," while Abusaid said: "What I feel, Ibn Sina calls perception." In short, both scholars were the first to recognize the equal rights of the intellectual-logical and emotional-symbolic paths in understanding the material world and the spiritual world of man.

Unfortunately, in this dialogue and in some other places, Ibn Sina's attitude to religion has not found its true interpretation. In some places, as a result of the years of stagnation, the great Sage is depicted as an atheist. In the epic, Ibn Sina even argues with God and tries to expose him. However, in the epic "The Sage and Death" by A. Aripov, created in the same period, Ibn Sina's attitude to religion has found its somewhat true expression. The poet neither deepens this attitude (the era did not allow this - A.T.), nor does he falsify it (he does not want to distort historical truth - A.T.). In the epic, Sage is always afraid of doubting God. He behaves very cautiously. He considers God the creator of all his blessings. And in every particle he sees his reflection:

What is the purpose of creation? At such a time, the Wise
He bowed his head in repentance, saying that he had brought it.
You ordered slaves to do slave work,
If you are in every particle, you are the cradle.

Hakim also undoubtedly strives for the Truth. However, he believes that it is possible to reach the Truth only by directly solving life's problems, by overcoming difficulties:

... If only I could find a cure for death, it would be enough,
All questions would be solved, Hakim would say.

It can be seen that not all artists went against religion in the same way even during the Shuro period, and there were brave writers like A. Oripov in those times as well.

A. Aripov, on the other hand, took a completely different approach to creating the character of Abu Ali ibn Sino. Unlike M. Qanoat, he does not try to create a complete picture of Ibn Sino's activities. The poet is more interested in the events surrounding Ibn Sino's medical career and his death.

Historical sources testify that Ibn Sina trained many students during his life. He made friends. But not all of these friends and students were loyal to him. Among them were traitors and hypocrites. One of such traitors was the scholar's student Ibrahim from Hamadan. Ibrahim got into Ibn Sina's trap and caused him many troubles. Historical sources indicate that the betrayal of his students was the cause of Ibn Sina's death. Ibn Sina suffered from tuberculosis for many years and treated himself. He committed suicide. But Hakim's illness worsened and eventually he suffered from epilepsy. "One day," says al-Juzjani, "he ordered that two celery seeds be mixed into the thing he was going to ejaculate (Ibn Sino - A.T.). He wanted to expel the worms from his intestines with this. One of the doctors who was treating him put five dirhams of celery seeds in it. Whether he did this on purpose or by mistake, I do not know, because I was not involved in this matter. The pungency of this seed increased his intestinal spasms. He used to drink Mithridat for epilepsy. One of the servants added more opium (to Mithridat) and the Sheikh drank it. The reason for this was that they had betrayed the Sheikh's great wealth and were afraid of the consequences of their actions and therefore expected his death."

Such events associated with the death of Ibn Sina have been interpreted differently in various sources, as well as in works of folk oral literature. For example, in the legend "Ibn Sina and the Cure for Death", it is interpreted as follows:

Abu Ali ibn Sina also found a cure for death. When he was dying, he bequeathed a medicine to one of his students. The medicine was kept in forty jars. "This medicine," said Abu Ali ibn Sina, "you will drip it into my mouth after I die." After the doctor died, his student dripped the medicine. When he dripped the thirty-ninth medicine, the doctor began to open his eyes. Then the student threw the fortieth medicine to the ground, and as a result, the doctor did not come back to life.

In the epic "Hakim and Death", Abdulla Oripov creates a beautiful example of this narrative, characteristic of the epic genre.

In conclusion, the creation of historical reality and the character of historical figures in artistic works is a complex process, in which the creators used colorful methods and methods, not only according to the students of the genre, but also based on the historical reality or historical person's place and qualities in history. This can be fully convinced only by the peculiarities of the creation of the image of Ibn Sina.
