Games are considered independent, public, ancient and traditional genres of children's folklore. Its historical and genetic roots go back to the distant past. The play has gone through a certain stage of poetic development and is characterized by the possession of a specific place of performance, performance situation, performers, world of images, traditional plot types. The main performers of the games are children of different ages, in which the principle of dramatic representation of a reality in accordance with children's thinking leads in the mixture of action and words.

Games stand among other genres of folklore in terms of their educational value and ideological content. Genre characteristics of children's traditional games are determined by such qualities as the product of collective creativity, orality, traditionality, anonymity, variability, characteristic of oral artistic creativity. In most games, the skill of words and actions plays an important role.

The ideological content of the games is wide and varied. The games include information on various beliefs, mythological concepts, rituals and customs of ancient people, various test competitions that serve to increase the physical strength of a person related to running, jumping, shooting, and fighting. tests of sharpening the mind leading to spiritual maturity, real life picture, interpersonal relations, production situations - in general, the reality of life is reflected in dramatic forms by means of life fictions. The owners of this dramatic scene are children.

In games, the reality of life is reflected in a fictional way in a way that is suitable for children's thinking and worldview, in a way that arouses artistic-aesthetic pleasure and corresponds to their physical and mental capabilities. Therefore, most of the motives of the game acquire an educational and didactic character. However, some of them are notable for their social and domestic nature. Uzbek children's games are very interesting. They have their own aspects as a pedagogical, psychological, ethnological, historical, physiological and folklore phenomenon. Games reflect children's lifestyle, mentality, outlook, and interests. plot types, and the relationship to the reality of the time. Therefore, games are studied by dividing them into different subtypes.

Since children's games have pedagogical, ethnographic, historical, psychological, physiological and folkloristic aspects, it is observed that their internal types are also classified based on certain criteria and requirements of these disciplines. For this reason, many attempts have been made to classify children's games, various classifications have been made.

While ethnologists and psychologists are interested in the reflection of children's lifestyle, mentality, and worldview in games, pedagogues are looking at the role of games as a means of education and trying to scientifically and practically justify their importance in educating children both physically and spiritually. Folklorists study games as a literary phenomenon and try to reveal their unique ideological and artistic features, their essence as an oral dramatic work. Therefore, it is observed that games are classified differently by the staff of different disciplines based on the purpose of each discipline.

There are certain experiences in Uzbek folklore studies on the classification of Uzbek children's games. In particular, the efforts of G. Jahongirov, O. Safarov and Sh. Galiev, N. Safarova in this regard are noteworthy.

In the games, the reality of life is interpreted in different ways, through various real and figurative, and sometimes even mythological images. The structure of the games is different. Among them there are plot and non-plot. Plot games consist of one or two or more episodes. Motives in games vary depending on the type of game. Story games are also distinguished by having certain plot types.

If games are considered as a sample of oral artistic creativity-literary phenomenon, they conditionally belong to three types in terms of image interpretation, ideological content and composition, purpose and aesthetic tasks:

a) heroic games;

b) games about animals;

c) household games.

These types of games differ from each other in terms of their ideological content, the principle of depicting social reality, the state of play, the nature of performance, and the interpretation of images. However, they were played among children in different seasons. The characteristic of one of them is also evident in the other. Therefore, there are certain affinities between them, all combined in the form of a single system under the name of children's play.

a) heroic games. In the series of children's games, games with a heroic spirit form a separate category and have a special place of their own. Heroism is highly praised in such games. In them, the physical strength, wrestling, wrestling, marksmanship, entrepreneurship, dexterity, agility, bravery, intelligence and intelligence of the hero (game participant) are tested. So, the main feature of such games is that each act of heroism is connected with a test motive and the hero is evaluated on this basis. The events of this type of games develop as the hero encounters various difficulties, complications, unfavorable situations, and tests. Therefore, the test motive is the most active motive in this type of games. Heroic games have a unique plot composition. In their plot, the motive of setting a condition and solving it has an important place. In the solution of the game, of course, the winner (hero) is determined and his success is encouraged. testing the strength and intelligence of the hero, idealizing the hero is a traditional poetic motif characteristic of folk epic works, and later it was absorbed into the plot of folk plays. Children's folk games that glorify heroism were created in response to the need to determine the age of future heroes, wrestlers, patrons and defenders of the people, to test and educate young people's ability to cope with life's difficulties, as well as to wish that every child will grow up physically healthy and spiritually mature. Games of this type developed in two stages: In the first stage, a series of games serving as a means of testing the child's physical strength was created. In the second stage, spiritual (word) games were formed as a means of testing the child's mental strength. If physical strength is used in games that are a means of testing physical strength, it is required to win and show heroism in fulfilling certain conditions, in order to win in spiritual games, it is necessary for the child to use his mind, intelligence, be smart, enterprising, and resourceful.

In general, children's games with a heroic spirit glorify the physical and mental strength of human prowess. Through such games, children feel that they can achieve human glory and happiness only if they can combine their physical and mental abilities. Therefore, games of this type carry the didactic idea of strengthening children's self-confidence.

For games with a heroic spirit, matriarchal (in the example of the figure of the matriarch), later patriarchal (in the example of the figure of the boy game leader, the chairman), clan relations (in the example of the children of the matriarch or in general, the participants of the game joining a team under the leadership of the matriarch), battles between clans and tribes (a wrestling competition between two game teams, in which each game team tries to protect the interests of its own team, ғолиблик сари ҳаракати мисолида), nomadic and semi-nomadic way of life (in the case of a game participant running or fleeing from one place to another and settling down), the emergence of the first statehood and the rule of the country by the king, the formation of the palace management system (children play under the leadership of one matron, obeying his demands and wishes, the matron sometimes punishes or encourages children in the game according to the conditions of the game, in some cases, in the game, the minister, father, etc., help the mother-in-law (king) in organizing the game and managing the team of players), the valiant struggle of peoples and nations for their independence against foreign invaders served as a real ground. In addition, fantastic stories typical of fairy tales: it can be felt that the participation of mythological characters in the game, and children's encounters with them, had a certain influence on the plot of the games.

Bravery, bravery, the need to defeat any enemy in order to achieve victory, the idea of showing heroism along the way forms the main content of games in the spirit of heroism and leads.

The plot device of the games in the spirit of heroism is extremely similar to each other, and usually the hero faces various difficulties and trials on the way to achieving his goal. However, he overcomes all difficulties and achieves his goal. He uses his strength and defeats his opponents who try to stop him on his way. In heroic games, there are cases of struggle, battle episode, fulfillment of the test condition, destruction of the opponent. It expresses the bravery of a team or individual player. In this type of games, the heroic activity of each game participant is seen in the process of showing one-on-one struggle, capture, fulfillment of conditions, dexterity, agility, intelligence, resourcefulness, entrepreneurship, and marksmanship.

The basis of games in the spirit of heroism are popular ideas, universal views. By means of such games, feelings of patriotism, friendship, honesty, honesty, and enthusiasm are absorbed into children's minds.

In heroic games, the motive of the player to achieve something or to try to get it stands out. It is known that such a motif can be found in the plot of fairy tales and epics. However, in the games, it is shown that the hero achieves what he is striving for, victory, not with the help of any guardian power, as in fairy tales and epics, but only as a result of his physical and mental strength.

Testing the player's strength is a hallmark of heroic games. In this case, the test will certainly be in the form of a competition. Children's long running, long jumping, marksmanship skills, wrist strength will be tested, and the real winner will be determined. Among these are a number of games such as "Who is agile", "The most agile", "Ball shooting", "Sniper", "Who is faster?", "Tug of war", "Arrow and arrow shooting", "Hitting the target with a stick".

The games organized to determine the role model and test the physical strength of the player are usually called by researchers with various names such as physical games or sports games, rule games, role-playing games, and functional games. As for us, we prefer to call all the games organized in the form of a test competition, which are based on the motive of testing the child's physical and mental strength, heroic spirit games. After all, the main task of this type of games is to determine the winner, that is, the real hero of the game.

b) games about animals. Such games are widespread and occupy a special place in the folklore of children's games. They are mostly figurative. Because in such games, usually, a certain socio-political meaning is advanced through the conflict between strong and weak animals, including a cat and a mouse, a wolf and a rabbit or a goose, a fox and a duck, a rooster and a chicken, etc. Also, in another large part of the games about animals, the relations and conflicts between the herdsman (shepherd), poultry farmer and farmer and the animals and birds that attack livestock, poultry, and crops are expressed in a socio-political sense. In all of this, the class relation-the conflict between the oppressor and the oppressed-is understood. The plot of animal games was undoubtedly influenced by the plot of animal tales. This is evident from the similarities in the characters, plot, and names of the games about animals. In this respect, games about animals such as "Duck-Fox", "Rooster-Chicken", "The Wolf Came", "Epchil Rabbit", "My Goose", "Sparrows and a Cat" are characteristic. Only animal characters participate in them. There is no human character in the plot. While interpreting the character of an animal, children imitate its voice and movements and try to describe the real image of that animal.

In games played with the participation of animal-characters, just like in figurative tales, wolf, bear, fox-bloodthirsty, oppressor, cheater, free-sucker, conqueror, greedy person are represented; weak animals such as sheep, goats, lambs, geese, and rabbits are embodied in the form of the exploited oppressed people. The acquisition of such metaphorical content of games about animals corresponds only to the periods when class relations were formed and developed. However, until then, games about animals did not have a figurative meaning in a socio-political sense. True, games about animals have been created for a very long time. Its first samples were created by adults with the intention of teaching the young generation the characteristics of one or another totem animal, introducing children to animals that have risen to the level of cults, warning about the behavior of certain animals that pose a threat to human life, and explaining the uniqueness of the animal world to children. Especially in the ancient examples of this type of games, it is shown and explained to children as a game that a certain monster attacks weak animals and that animal escapes from this monster or becomes its prey. With this, children were taught that some animals are dangerous and that they should be careful.

Animal games preserve the idea that animals and birds experience the same spiritual experiences as humans, according to the totemistic concept of primitive man. Therefore, when children play in the image of a certain animal character, they tend to speak on behalf of him, act and behave like him.

So, through the underlying conflict of animal games, children are first taught to be strong, fearless, alert, clever, wise, and resourceful in order not to be easy in life.

Not all animal games are figurative. Some of them have a picture of real life; one or another event related to the lifestyle and working conditions of a farmer, shepherd, poultry farmer is expressed. For example, in games like "Poliz" and "Rabbits" and "Sparrows", real-life scenes related to animals causing damage to crops and causing concern to the farmer are described.

In Uzbek children's games about animals, there are many images of animals such as a wolf, a cunning fox, a goat, a rabbit, a bear wrestler, a rooster, a chicken, a stork, and a snake. Of these, the player who plays the role of a wolf, fox, bear wrestler is the only one who often stands on the ground and chases and catches runaway children. There are many players who play the role of goat, rabbit, and chicken, and they play the task of escaping without giving a handle. It is known that these characters are the main characters of fairy tales. In general, they are often found in the genres of folk tales and games of Turkic peoples.

The process of playing games about animals will be very exciting and exciting. Because when playing these kinds of games, children imitate the animal's voice and act according to its behavior in order to create the image of the animal they are playing. They try to perform the poetic passages of the game composition with a melody. This will encourage children to have more fun.

In games about animals, different aspects of animal life are symbolically expressed. For example, when children play the game "Cat-mouse", taking into account that the mouse lives in the holes under the wall, they line up and form a "wall" and thus block the path of the "cat" who likes to chase the mouse.

In the "Bear Wrestler" game, a boy playing the role of a bear comes out and pretends to be sleeping. This means that it is dangerous for the bear to fall asleep for a long time and disturb him in such a situation. However, in the game, the children disturb the "sleeping bear wrestler" and wake him up by "entering his garden to pick fruit." This makes the bear wrestler angry and chases the children. He "punishes" whoever he catches.

So, in the composition of the games about animals, the character of the animal takes part, a unique playing style, playing place, ideological content, composition of the plot, and it forms a certain independent category among children's games.

c) household games. Children's games that symbolically express information about the lifestyle of adults and children, rituals and traditions, certain professions, and life objects form a family of household games.

In household games, children play directly copying the lives of adults. In their games, they reflect scenes related to weddings, the birth of a baby and tying it to a cradle, funerals, and one or another of our traditions. Or, in such games, children describe a reality, a natural or life phenomenon that has affected them in real life conditions in the form of a game.

Most household games are characterized by the fact that they are played with toys. Because through toy-type copy of this or that household item (for example, household appliances and items, work tools) reduced and made in the form of miniatures, children react to a certain life reality that they are affected by. Often, such games of household content are called improvisational or imitative games by pedagogues, ethnologists and psychologists, and even some folklorists. In most cases, it is customary to call them dramatic games. However, the state of drama is observed in all types of games. Therefore, all children's games are literary phenomena belonging to folk drama. Therefore, it is not reasonable to consider only one type of games as dramatic games.

In domestic games, realistic situations are depicted (for example, waiting for a guest in the game "Guest-guest", honoring him with sweet food and treats, putting his honor in his place). Realities related to the lives of adults and children, various details related to social life are reflected from the perspective of children. They depict realistic situations combined with children's fiction. For example, for girls playing the "Wedding-Wedding" game, bottles filled with perfume or medicine play the role of "bride-groom". Different pieces of wood, fine stones, and grass serve as decorations for the wedding table.

In most household games, the act of imitating one or another profession is a priority. For example: in the game "Dukhtur-dukhtur" the imitation of the profession of a doctor, in the game "Hommapish" the ancient craft of pottery is leading.

Economic relations related to trade and commerce are reflected in the series of various social relations in household games.

Domestic games are based on real events, they are often played indoors, in the yard, and in the past even on the roofs of houses, on the banks of cool shady ditches.

In household games, realistic images of active people of life, representatives of hardworking people, owners of certain professions, heads of household or state are created. Such games are usually played without noise, quietly, quietly. During the game, children try to treat each other well. If a tension or disagreement arises during the game, the children themselves often resolve it and try to solve the problem peacefully.

In general, each type of Uzbek children's games shows the attitude towards reality in its own way. In them, the reflection of life in accordance with children's thinking was formed as a unique poetic motive. Therefore, by studying the expressive style, composition of images, content types, plot and composition of Uzbek children's games as a whole, it is important to determine the historical development of children's folklore and its role in preserving epic and poetic traditions in the structure of Uzbek folklore.
