Introduction

In today's developing world, teaching foreign languages, using them as a second language, not only in the educational process, but also for young generation who wants to find a job in the foreign language direction of higher educational institutions and in the field of English in general, is a strict requirement for them to use them as a second language.

In this regard, with the initiatives of President Shavkat Miromonich Mirziyoyev, many initiatives and reforms are being carried out in order to improve the level of knowledge of foreign languages among young people, and it is not for nothing that at the moment a lot of attention is focused on learning foreign languages. recruitment and they are required to obtain B2 or C1 level certificate and IELTS certificate. The purpose of this is that the young generation knows foreign languages as if it were their mother tongue, the ability to speak fluently in the process of speech and to use it in the process of communicating with others, and to master modern technologies of the developing day without any obstacles.

But all young people face many difficulties in the learning process at the same level. Because English grammar is complex and has a different structure from Uzbek grammar. As a result, learners may find English grammar more difficult in the process of speaking, and this will cause the wrong message to be conveyed. Only students who have good knowledge of the Uzbek language, more knowledge and skills about grammar rules and their places of use can learn English. Learning the language requires many rules from the student as well as the teacher , is not only to pay more attention to their listening and speaking skills, but also to help them by giving them a passion for English, a good attitude and great motivation. In particular, it is necessary to teach English language to students from a young age, that is, from elementary school, and create a comfortable environment for them to learn English well.

However, the following problems are observed among students:

1) Disturbed environment of the classroom. The environment is very important in teaching and learning English. A disturbing environment in the classroom distracts the students and negatively affects language learning. A suitable and comfortable environment is the main need for teaching English. If the environment is not suitable and comfortable for the students, it disrupts the process of English language teaching. In teaching English, mainly teachers face such an unfavorable environment.

2)Limited teaching resources, not only foreign language, but teaching something depends on multifaceted resources. Teachers often face this problem. That is, teachers do not provide enough resources to students to learn English effectively. Without these, it is very difficult to teach and learn the language. Resources include speakers, microphones, projectors, computer systems, and other digital devices that make teaching and learning more effective and fun.

3) Too many students or students in the class. This causes a lot of anxiety and stress. Because teachers have to put more effort and hard work to teach a large number of students.

Despite these issues,however, we can overcome them according to these solutions:

1) Creating Supportive Learning Environments

A conducive learning environment is a cornerstone for effective language acquisition. This includes both the physical and psychological aspects of the classroom. Physically, classrooms must be well-ventilated, adequately lit, free from noise pollution, and equipped with comfortable seating and modern teaching aids such as projectors, smart boards, and sound systems. Psychologically, the classroom atmosphere must foster inclusivity, respect, and encouragement. Students need to feel safe and motivated to participate, even if they make mistakes. Teachers can create such environments by promoting cooperative learning, using positive reinforcement, and integrating cultural materials that spark interest. For instance, allowing students to engage with authentic English-language media (films, songs, or literature) not only enriches the environment but also helps students contextualize their learning.

2) Improving Access to Educational Resources

Effective foreign language instruction depends heavily on the availability of educational materials. Unfortunately, many institutions, especially in rural or underfunded areas, lack basic language-learning tools such as up-to-date textbooks, language labs, multimedia content, and stable internet access. Bridging this gap requires investment at both governmental and institutional levels. Educational authorities should prioritize the provision of modern resources, including online learning platforms, audio-visual aids, mobile applications, and access to international publications. Furthermore, open educational resources (OER) can be a cost-effective solution. These include freely accessible digital libraries and platforms like Duolingo, BBC Learning English, and Coursera language courses. Teachers should also be trained to curate and adapt such resources to meet their students' needs effectively.

3) Reducing Class Sizes

Overcrowded classrooms present one of the biggest challenges in foreign language education. When a teacher must manage 30 to 40 students simultaneously, it becomes nearly impossible to provide individualized attention, correct pronunciation, or engage students in speaking activities. Large class sizes hinder participation and limit feedback, especially in oral communication – a crucial component of language learning. Reducing the student-teacher ratio enables more personalized instruction, enhances classroom management, and encourages students to practice their speaking and listening skills more frequently. Where physical reduction is not possible, technological tools like breakout rooms in online classes or peer-tutoring programs can be implemented to simulate small-group interaction.

4) Curriculum Reform and Early Language Exposure

Many of the current curricula are outdated, grammar-heavy, and disconnected from real-life communication. To address this, curriculum reform should emphasize communicative competence over rote memorization. Integrating real-world tasks, project-based learning, and interdisciplinary content helps students see the relevance of language in daily life. Early exposure is another critical factor. Language education should begin in primary school or even earlier, taking advantage of the brain's plasticity during early childhood. Immersion-based approaches, bilingual education programs, and the inclusion of English as a medium of instruction in selected subjects can accelerate proficiency. Countries like the Netherlands and Finland have successfully implemented such reforms with impressive results.

5) Teacher Training and Motivation

No educational reform can succeed without competent and motivated teachers. Unfortunately, many language teachers lack the necessary professional development opportunities to stay updated with modern teaching methods. Regular training workshops, online certifications, and international exchange programs should be established to enhance teachers' methodological and linguistic skills. Additionally, motivational factors such as recognition, career development prospects, and adequate remuneration must be addressed. Encouraging teachers to conduct research, publish, or present at conferences can foster a culture of academic growth. Involving teachers in decision-making processes regarding curriculum and assessment reform can also increase their engagement and sense of ownership over their teaching practices.

Conclusion

In conclusion, it can be said that knowledge of a foreign language is very important in educating today's young people to be mature in all aspects, strong specialists in their field, and in this regard there are several problems in teaching a foreign language in schools. In order to eliminate these problems, teachers use new teaching methods in foreign language teaching. it will be appropriate if they use it.
