This article discusses how children can be taught diligence and prepared for work through play activities.

Keywords: play, folklore, labor, work, children, adults, genre.

Introduction

Games occupy a special place in children's activities and represent multifaceted, ethnopedagogical phenomena that are both traditional and widespread. They are considered an integral part of national culture. In every nation, games are regarded as priceless cultural treasures because they reflect the lifestyle, customs, worldview, and moral-aesthetic values of the people. Through games, a nation’s past, present, and future are manifested. It is difficult to imagine children’s lives without games.

Each game is an independent folkloric piece. The earliest examples of games were created in ancient times and have served as tools for self-education, adaptation to existing conditions, and physical development for generations.

Main Body

Games reflect the practical experience of a nation and are imbued with its spiritual and ethical values. They teach children honesty, courage, kindness, and compassion. Most games are competitive in nature and promote fairness as a necessary condition for success.

Games serve social, physiological, and aesthetic purposes in children's lives. Socially, games help children engage with their environment—nature, society, and family. They collect natural items like branches, leaves, clay, stones, etc., and use them in their games. Many games take place in natural settings—by water, at the foot of mountains, or under trees. Sometimes, children take care of animals or grow plants as part of their play, which brings them joy and satisfaction.

Children observe the lifestyle and work of adults and reflect these experiences in their games. Activities within the family such as hospitality, household chores, and survival strategies influence children. They imitate these behaviors in their games, thus preparing themselves for real life and social involvement.

Physiologically, play satisfies a child's natural, physical, and emotional needs. According to health experts, physical activity is essential for the healthy development of children. Games help children grow strong, resilient, and agile. Their bodily systems develop properly and become stronger.

Aesthetically, games provide spiritual satisfaction and joy. They influence children's emotions to such a degree that they may inspire dreams and aspirations toward particular professions. For example, a child flying a kite may begin to dream of becoming a pilot; a child drawing with chalk may be inspired to become an artist. As interest in these games grows, they may eventually influence career choices.

Educational Functions of Traditional Games

Like other genres of folklore, games serve multiple purposes. Key among them is the moral-educational function. This function is based on the life lessons and ethical messages embedded in the games. Most games promote work ethic, skill acquisition, teamwork, friendship, bravery, and the desire to protect others—thus encouraging a wide range of positive human traits.

Traditional games embody cultural values in a unique and artistic form and are passed down from generation to generation. They often convey messages of patriotism, national pride, and love for the homeland. Games such as “Fortress Defense”, “Is it a White Poplar or a Blue Poplar?”, “Capture the Flag”, and “City Travels” reflect these themes vividly.

Example: The "Capture the Flag" Game

This game, played outdoors in summer, symbolizes patriotism. A flag represents a nation’s sovereignty. If it falls into enemy hands, it signifies defeat and loss of independence. The game's rules mimic real-life defense strategies—teams protect their flag and try to capture the opponent's flag.

The game teaches alertness, teamwork, and a deep respect for national symbols. Children learn...
