Annotation:

This paper explores the challenges and strategies involved in translating historicisms within literary texts, focusing on Abdulla Qodiriy's renowned historical novel O'tkan kunlar (Bygone Days). The novel, rich in cultural, political, and historical references of 19th-century Central Asia, presents unique difficulties for translators due to the use of historicisms — words, concepts, and cultural artifacts that are deeply rooted in a specific historical period. The study analyzes selected examples from the original Uzbek text and their translations, discusses the preservation of historical authenticity, and examines techniques such as footnoting, descriptive translation, and borrowing. By drawing comparisons with English literary translation norms, the paper highlights the delicate balance between fidelity and comprehensibility, aiming to contribute to the growing field of literary and cultural translation studies.

Аннотация:

В данной статье рассматриваются проблемы и стратегии перевода историзмов в художественных текстах на примере известного исторического романа Абдуллы Кадыри «Откан кунлар» («Минувшие дни»). Роман, насыщенный культурными, политическими и историческими реалиями Центральной Азии XIX века, представляет собой особую сложность для переводчиков из-за использования историзмов — слов, понятий и культурных артефактов, глубоко укоренившихся в конкретном историческом контексте. В исследовании анализируются отдельные примеры из оригинального узбекского текста и их переводы, рассматриваются вопросы сохранения исторической достоверности, а также методы перевода, такие как сноски, описательный перевод и заимствование. Сравнивая переводческие нормы английской художественной литературы, автор подчеркивает тонкий баланс между точностью передачи оригинала и доступностью для читателя. Работа направлена на вклад в развитие исследований в области художественного и культурного перевода.

Introduction

In literary translation, one of the most complex challenges is the rendering of historicisms — lexical or cultural elements that are specific to a certain historical period and are often no longer in use. Historicisms not only reflect a bygone linguistic reality but also serve as cultural markers that shape the atmosphere and worldview of a literary work. Their preservation or adaptation in translation directly impacts the target reader’s perception of the source culture.

Abdulla Qodiriy’s novel O‘tkan kunlar (1925), considered the first Uzbek novel, is a rich narrative that embodies the language, politics, social structures, and cultural norms of 19th-century Bukhara and Tashkent. Translating this novel into English requires more than linguistic accuracy; it demands cultural sensitivity and historical awareness. This paper analyzes the role and translation of historicisms in O‘tkan kunlar, illustrating the balance between historical fidelity and reader accessibility.

Defining Historicisms in Translation

Historicism in translation refers to the translation of words and concepts that are exclusive to a past era, particularly those that have no modern equivalent or that would be obscure to contemporary audiences. These may include:

- Obsolete social ranks and titles (e.g., bek, mingboshi)
- Historical objects (chortoq, do‘ppi, zarduzi)
- Outdated political systems and legal concepts
- Religious institutions and terminologies of the time

In O‘tkan kunlar, these elements are not mere background; they are integral to plot development and character formation. As such, translators must decide whether to retain the historicized terms, explain them, or substitute them with functionally equivalent expressions.

Examples from O‘tkan kunlar and Their Translation

1. Term: “Bek”

Source: “Askarbekning uyi qo‘rg‘on ichida edi.” Translation Option 1 (Borrowing): “Askarbek’s house was inside the qo‘rg‘on.” Translation Option 2 (Descriptive): “Askarbek’s house was within the walled citadel.”

Analysis: The term bek refers to a feudal lord or regional ruler. While borrowing preserves the term’s cultural flavor, it risks reader confusion. A footnote or glossary can provide clarification. In many English translations, such titles are kept untranslated but italicized with a note.

2. Term: “Chortoq”

Source: "Erkaklar chortoqda o'tirib, choy ichishardi." Literal Translation: "The men sat on the chortoq, drinking tea." Contextual Translation: "The men sat on the raised wooden platform, sipping tea."

Analysis: Chortoq is a traditional Central Asian raised seating platform used outdoors. This word has no direct English equivalent, requiring either a brief description or borrowing with explanation.

3. Term: "Do'ppi"

Source: "Otashali do'ppisini echdi."

Translation: "Otashali removed his do'ppi (Uzbek skullcap)."

Analysis: Since do'ppi is a culture-specific article of clothing, the translator may opt for transliteration with a brief gloss, or for generalization (e.g., "hat"), which risks loss of cultural specificity.

4. Religious-Historical Reference: "Shariat"

Source: "Shariat hukmi bilan bu nikoh bekor qilinadi."

Translation: "According to Sharia law, this marriage is invalidated."

Analysis: Here, the term "Sharia" is widely recognized in English, although its historical application in 19th-century Central Asia differs from modern interpretations. Contextualization is important.

Translation Strategies

Translators have several strategies at their disposal when dealing with historicisms:

1. Retention with Glossary/Footnote – Maintains authenticity but requires reader effort.
2. Descriptive Translation – Explains the meaning but may disrupt the narrative flow.
3. Functional Substitution – Uses culturally equivalent terms, but risks cultural dilution.
4. Omission or Generalization – May simplify comprehension but erodes historical color.

For example, retaining terms like begim (a noblewoman) adds to the cultural setting but requires explanatory devices. In contrast, substituting madrasah with "religious school" simplifies but weakens specificity.

The Translator's Dilemma: Fidelity vs. Accessibility

The translator must balance two poles: being faithful to the source culture and being accessible to the target audience. Overuse of footnotes can burden the reader, while excessive simplification may erase historical and cultural richness. The goal, then, is strategic mediation.

Eugene Nida's principle of "dynamic equivalence" and Lawrence Venuti's "foreignization vs. domestication" dichotomy are useful frameworks. In the case of O'tkan kunlar, a slightly foreignized approach — keeping culturally significant terms with brief explanations — seems most appropriate.

Conclusion

Translating historicisms in literary texts like O'tkan kunlar is both a linguistic and cultural act. These elements provide authenticity, but also challenge comprehensibility. Effective translation involves preserving the historical atmosphere while ensuring that the narrative remains engaging to modern readers. By analyzing specific terms and considering multiple strategies, this paper demonstrates the translator's role as both mediator and preserver of cultural memory.

Future studies could explore reception among English-speaking audiences and compare translations by different translators to further investigate the impact of historicism translation strategies.
