Abstract

This article investigates the linguoculturological features that shape short story discourse in English and Uzbek languages. By examining the intersection of linguistic structure, cultural codes, narrative patterns, and worldview, the study demonstrates that short stories function not only as literary artifacts but also as culturally embedded communicative acts. Through comparative textual analysis, the article identifies how cultural metaphors, national conceptual systems, character behavior models, and sociocultural values manifest in the linguistic and narrative choices of English and Uzbek short stories. The findings show that while English short stories often foreground individualism, psychological nuance, and implicit meaning-making, Uzbek short stories preserve communal values, explicit moral intentions, and culturally marked speech genres rooted in oral storytelling traditions. The study contributes to the understanding of how linguistic and cultural elements co-construct meaning across distinct literary systems.

1. Introduction

Short stories play a pivotal role in the representation of cultural identity through language. They encapsulate collective experiences, national values, and the worldview of a particular society. In both English and Uzbek literary traditions, the short story is a dynamic genre that reflects linguistic structures, cultural concepts, and narrative strategies characteristic of each community. The analysis of such texts through a linguoculturological lens enables a deeper understanding of how language serves as a medium for cultural conceptualization.Linguoculturology, emerging at the intersection of linguistics, cultural studies, and cognitive science, examines the cultural meanings encoded in language. When applied to literary discourse, it reveals how writers utilize culturally significant symbols, speech acts, metaphors, and narrative forms to construct meaning. In the context of English and Uzbek short stories, linguoculturally marked units provide insight into mental frameworks and communicative behaviors typical of each culture.

This study aims to compare the linguoculturological features of short stories across the two languages, focusing on conceptual metaphors, cultural values, character archetypes, and narrative techniques. Such comparative analysis enhances cross-cultural understanding and enriches the study of literary linguistics.Linguoculturology assumes that culture is reflected in language at multiple levels—lexical, semantic, pragmatic, and discourse-structural. In literary texts, this reflection is heightened, as authors intentionally employ culturally resonant elements to represent the lived experiences of their communities.

Cultural Concept

A cultural concept is a mental construct shaped by a society's historical memory, value system, and worldview. Concepts such as freedom, fate, hospitality, and honor exist in both English and Uzbek cultures but are conceptualized differently, and their linguistic representations vary across short stories.These include:

- national realia (e.g., tea ceremony, mahalla, Thanksgiving),
- culturally specific metaphors,
- forms of address,
- idiomatic expressions rooted in tradition.

English short stories often employ minimalism, ambiguity, and open endings, while Uzbek short stories tend to reflect oral traditions, moral conclusions, collectivist values, and socially grounded conflicts.These theoretical categories guide the comparative analysis in subsequent sections.English short stories, particularly those by authors such as Ernest Hemingway, Katherine Mansfield, and O. Henry, illustrate cultural values associated with Western individualism, psychological depth, and interpersonal complexity.English narratives frequently portray self-determined characters whose internal motivations drive the plot. This reflects the cultural emphasis on personal autonomy and emotional introspection. Examples:

- Hemingway's "Hills Like White Elephants" conveys complex personal choice through minimalistic dialogue.
- Mansfield's stories highlight individual perception and psychological subtlety.

The "iceberg theory" and reliance on subtext are characteristic features. Cultural norms of privacy, indirectness, and emotional restraint shape dialogues and narrative strategies.English short stories often rely on metaphors reflecting Western philosophical traditions—time, individuality, morality, love, and existentialism. Such metaphors are universal but framed in culturally specific imagery.

English literature frequently explores ordinary life as a space for moral, emotional, or existential insight. This is tied to the cultural preference for authenticity and personal realism.Together, these features construct a literary ecosystem where language mirrors the cultural orientation toward independence, personal expression, and psychological depth.Uzbek short stories, shaped by oral traditions, regional cultural values, and collectivist social structures, often highlight moral teachings, strong community ties, and cultural symbolism. Writers such as Abdulla Qodiriy, Said Ahmad, O'tkir Hoshimov, and Shukur Xolmirzayev exemplify these tendencies.Characters typically act within the context of family, community, and societal norms. Conflicts often arise from social obligations rather than individual desires.Short stories frequently incorporate explicit moral lessons, reflecting cultural norms and traditional values such as respect for elders, hospitality, humility, and honor.Common lexical markers include:

- mahalla, ota-ona, bobo, Navro'z, osh, doira,
- metaphors tied to land, kinship, and spirituality.

These realia are essential carriers of cultural memory. Narrative structures often parallel folklore patterns: descriptive openings, proverb-like conclusions, emotionally expressive narration, clear moral positioning of characters.

Thus, Uzbek short stories serve as vehicles of collective wisdom and cultural continuity.Through a linguoculturological perspective, several key cross-cultural contrasts and parallels emerge.

- English stories prioritize individualism, personal conflict, and internal psychological complexity.
- Uzbek stories emphasize communal harmony, shared norms, and moral responsibility.

While both traditions deal with universal themes such as love, conflict, and fate, their linguistic encoding differs: English texts use abstract metaphors and implicit emotion and Uzbek texts employ concrete imagery linked to nature, family, and tradition.

- English discourse uses implicit meaning-making and subtle cues.
- Uzbek discourse employs expressive language, emotional appeals, and culturally grounded speech acts.

This comparison shows that linguistic choices in short stories are deeply rooted in cultural norms and communicative expectations.

Conclusion

The linguoculturological analysis of English and Uzbek short stories demonstrates that literary language is culturally constructed and reveals fundamental aspects of each society's worldview. English short stories highlight individual experience, psychological nuance, and implicit communication, while Uzbek short stories foreground social values, expressive narration, and culturally marked imagery.

Understanding these distinctions enhances comparative literary studies, supports intercultural communication, and enriches language education by integrating cultural knowledge with linguistic analysis. Future research may extend this comparison to contemporary digital storytelling or examine how globalization influences cultural markers in modern literature.
