Introduction. Gender education is one of the key issues of modern society. It serves to ensure equal rights and opportunities for men and women, strengthen social stability and justice. International cooperation and national legal frameworks aimed at ensuring gender equality play an important role in this regard. Currently, state policy is creating the necessary mechanisms to achieve gender equality, which leads to positive changes in all spheres of society.

establishing social justice in society are one of the main conditions. The creation of a legal framework aimed at ensuring gender equality in the Republic of Uzbekistan indicates that reforms in this area are being implemented on a large scale.

The concept of gender identity is the idea of oneself in relation to cultural concepts of masculinity and femininity. The concept does not operate outside the bounds of purely subjective experience and serves as a psychological interiorization of masculine and feminine characteristics, arising as a result of the process of interaction between the "I" and others. The existence of transvestite and transsexual identities shows that gender is not a function of sex, but rather a consequence of the emergence of gender identities.

Studying this issue is important in determining what legal restrictions should be removed to ensure women's active participation in public life and what the nature of reform policies should be to end inequality between men and women.

Recent research shows that existing gender problems and conflicts, and the subordination of women in society, are reproduced through existing institutional structures, such as the household, the community, the state, and civil society. These institutional structures and the interrelationships within them necessitate the study of their impact on gender development and the choices available to all members of society.

Relevance of the topic. In recent years, significant legal and institutional measures have been taken in the Republic of Uzbekistan to ensure gender equality. Through presidential decrees and national legislation, women's rights are protected and equal opportunities are created for them. Achieving gender equality contributes not only to the protection of women's rights, but also to the general well-being of society.

Gender equality also implies the ability of women to make independent decisions about matters affecting their own fate. This means that a woman's equal participation in deciding who and when she marries, what profession she chooses, and whether and how many children she has.

Gender development largely depends on equal opportunities for men and women to enjoy spiritual resources, including information, knowledge, and self-awareness.

A just society ensures that all citizens enjoy these resources without discrimination and equally, thereby contributing to the improvement of the situation of women and directing development towards achieving gender equality. Women's access to available knowledge, information and vocational training not only ensures their participation in society, but also helps to eliminate their subordination. While ensuring gender equality in rights and opportunities through legislation is necessary for gender development, it is not sufficient. The law protects people and defines their rights as citizens. However, in many countries, despite the fact that the most basic freedoms and rights of all citizens are equally guaranteed, women's lives are often determined by family obligations and religious traditions, which may conflict with formal rights. Therefore, in order to achieve gender equality, it is important that the equal rights and opportunities provided by law are accepted by society as a whole. In real life, the transition to gender equality, the recognition by society of equal rights to choose for both men and women, is a hotly debated issue.

Currently, a comprehensive system of indicators has been developed that measures the status of women and gender equality. The transition to gender equality can be achieved in two ways: through protection policies and through women's initiatives, which find expression in the women's movement:

The extent to which society's life proceeds, the steps taken towards development, and the results expected from any action are, of course, in many ways directly related to social relations. It is precisely these relations that govern all aspects of our lives - work, family, neighborhood, study, communication, and various other processes[7].

The extent to which society's life proceeds, the steps taken towards development, and the results expected from any action are, of course, in many ways directly related to social relations. It is precisely these relations that govern all aspects of our lives - work, family, neighborhood, study, communication, and various other processes.

The issue of equal rights of women and men is also important in these processes, as relations are regulated by law.

In recent years, our President has been creating favorable conditions for women's issues, improving their living conditions, solving their problems in everyday life, and demonstrating their talents and capabilities. As a result of special attention being paid to increasing the activity of women in the family, society, and especially in social life, significant changes are being made in both social relations and legislation.

The Resolution of the President of the Republic of Uzbekistan “On measures to further strengthen guarantees of women's labor rights and support entrepreneurial activity” of March 7, 2019 marked a fundamental turning point in this direction. This resolution set as an important task the development of new laws on equal rights for women and men and protection from oppression and violence. The fact that the specified laws have been developed, discussed and approved indicates that the implementation of the resolution has been ensured.

The purpose of the Law “On Guarantees of Equal Rights and Opportunities for Women and Men”, approved at the twenty-first plenary session of the Senate of the Oliy Majlis and signed by the President, is to ensure guarantees of equal rights and opportunities for women and men, regulate social relations in the field. In addition, it serves as a basis for clarifying many issues and developing relevant regulatory legal acts in the field of activity[6].

It is worth noting that there are misinterpretations and misconceptions in the understanding and use of the word gender, which is actively used today. In particular, it is observed that gender is considered a women's issue or a concept related to their superiority. Of course, this is not true. This law clearly states that gender is a social aspect of relations between women and men, manifested in all spheres of social life and activity, including politics, economics, law, ideology and culture, education, science. The presence of appropriate explanations for concepts related to this issue is one of the most important aspects in regulating social relations.

The law defines legality, democracy, non-discrimination on the basis of gender, openness, and transparency as the main principles for ensuring guarantees of equal rights and opportunities for women and men.

Now it is important to form, improve and develop a regulatory framework in this area, and the development and implementation of state programs, national action plans and strategies are the most important tasks in this context. Because through the creation of these documents and the development of specific implementation mechanisms, activities will be organized in such areas as the formation of a legal culture on equal rights and opportunities for women and men, ensuring their equal participation in the management of society and state affairs, and the formation of responsible motherhood and fatherhood[8].

The adoption of the law guarantees women's participation in state administration on equal terms with men, especially in leadership positions. The law also stipulates that women and men will be guaranteed equal rights in elections to representative bodies of power and in the nomination of candidates by political parties to the Legislative Chamber of the Oliy Majlis and the Councils of People's Deputies.

It is, of course, a sad fact that there are families in society that discriminate against women and experience difficulties in their lives as a result of unjustified inequality. It is worth noting that both mothers and fathers are equally responsible in family relations, especially in raising children. The law also specifies guarantees of equal rights and opportunities for men and women in this regard, and stipulates that they have equal obligations. These include the voluntary nature of marriage between women and men, the inadmissibility of forced and early marriages, and the equality of personal and property rights and obligations of spouses. Both fathers and mothers have equal rights to paid parental leave. The fact that the duration of parental leave is divided between the parents at their discretion, and that parents can take the leave in parts, is also an expression of gender equality[5].

The law also reflects the guarantees of equal rights and opportunities for women and men in the fields of education, science, culture and healthcare. It is worth noting that women in our country are actively engaged in labor activities in these areas. It is known that women working at all stages of education, in the scientific and research fields, and in medicine constitute the majority.

Now it will be necessary to carry out a lot of work in such areas as promoting gender awareness among citizens by introducing gender issues into various educational programs, preparing and publishing educational literature free from misconceptions based on the idea of the superiority of one of the sexes, and organizing information and educational events aimed at increasing the legal culture of the population on issues of ensuring the implementation of gender policy.

The development and implementation of courses on gender equality issues in educational programs and advanced training courses of higher education institutions will teach our youth to correctly interpret the issues provided for in this law and to act in life on the basis of mutual respect. The urgent importance of gender equality in social relations, which is important for the development of society, is becoming more and more evident today.

Conclusion. Gender equality is crucial for the development of society. This article provides a comprehensive analysis of the measures taken to ensure women's rights, increase their social activity, and achieve economic, political, and cultural equality in society. Achieving gender equality requires not only the creation of legal foundations, but also the acceptance and implementation of these principles by society. Creating equal opportunities for women and men is an important condition for sustainable development. This not only serves to protect women's rights, but also to strengthen the principles of general well-being and justice in society.

Recommendations:

- It is necessary to widely disseminate information about gender equality legislation among citizens, especially women, and conduct special trainings and seminars.

- It is necessary to introduce special courses on gender equality into educational programs, and to educate young people in the spirit of respect for the principles of equal rights.

- It is necessary to develop national action plans to strengthen gender equality and strengthen financial and technical assistance for their effective implementation.

- It is necessary to create additional opportunities and introduce support programs to increase the participation of women in business, entrepreneurship and leadership.

- It is important to introduce an effective monitoring system against gender discrimination in the labor market, education and politics and strengthen public control in this regard.

- To organize educational programs in the media to change cultural attitudes towards gender equality.
